It is evident from these and other letters that have come to hand, that the gifts of our readers will not only relieve the starving and save a multitude of lives, but will help the cause of Christ in India. The alacrity with which the missionaries distributed the money, proves how urgent was the need and how glad they are to have the means of supplying it. The Hindoo cannot fail to understand this. He might have had his doubts about the superiority of Christianity to his own religion, but he cannot doubt the goodness of the man who feeds him and saves his wife and children from the agonies of starvation. The religion that prompted the relief will henceforth have a different aspect for him. It will never be forgotten that in the hour of India's need, Christian people on the other side the globe sent the spectator was not likely to forget. A thousand people always make a stir, but you cannot describe the impression which a thousand living skeletons make upon you the first time that you see it. But the most heartrending sight of all was the children for it is by no fault of theirs that they are there. I defy any man not to be moved at the sight of sunken, listless eyes, which should be bright and laughing, drawn skins which should be round and smooth, and long limbs aching for sustenance—just caricatures of what the growing human frame should be: little mites who have been born into the world never to know the pleasures of sunny childhood.

"Sick and listless, too reduced and rickety even to smile, they sit by their mothers' sides and whine for food. One wonders that the human structure can stand the strain and last—but it is a heart-rending sight." In spite of all that is being done for the salvation of life, 2,442 persons died from starvation in the Jabalpur district alone during the five weeks covered by the latest returns. This, too, is the Government record, which is confessedly below the actual figures, as it does not include deaths from diseases produced by hunger. Such a record is its own plea. No one with a heart can turn a deaf ear to it.

York. In Greenwich street, West of the thoroughfares abutting on the streets, groups of olive-complexioned men from South-eastern Europe, from Asia and Northern Africa may be seen all day and evening congregating around these resorts, discussing the latest news of the continent of Greece and Crete. The listless expression of the Oriental is disappeared and in its stead is a keen, intent look of people deeply concerned in the events of the time. Greeks, Armenians, Bulgarians, Egyptians and men of other races whose nationality may be traced to lands controlled or ruled by the Turk, anxiously await the news from the seat of war. The restaurant is the place where men are to be found who have private letters from the front and where newspapers in native languages may be found and some of the more enterprising of these men there is some one, generally a boy, in a rear room who can read from our newspapers the cable dispatches and translate them into the language of his choice. Gratefully appreciating, as these men from the Orient do, the refuge afforded them, and the wide liberty that they enjoy in this land of freedom, the memories of home and native land are often on their hearts, and it is a relief to them in the midst of their strange surroundings, to meet their fellow-countrymen, to sit like themselves, and hear the familiar accents of their own languages. By and by, as he sees them at the doorway of their resorts and notices the peculiarities of their attire, and hears their strange speech, wonders for the moment whether he is not in some Oriental land. But it is only for a moment, for he as they try to raise his eyes, to see the standard banner waving from some building of mast, which reminds him of the flag for the presence of these strange people, and he rejoices that his country is home a refuge for the oppressed and the downtrodden of every clime, that all are welcome, and all may abide in peace and safety. We can but wish that men who come, and those who leave them might look still farther, through Christ obtain a right to enter a better land which is open to all who seek it, and where every race will be permitted.

For we shall come from the east and the west and shall dwell in the kingdom of heaven. (Matt. 23:13.)

Restored.
A dramatic incident which has recently given joy to two aged parents, is related by a Iowa correspondent of the Philadelphia Record. He says that a well-to-do couple living near Akron, Ia., have reared and educated a boy whom they adopted some ten years ago, he being at that time about nine years old. They formerly lived in Montreal, where they had one child, a pretty little boy, who as their only child and heir, was cherished and loved with all the fond parents' affection. But one day in 1878, a careless servant who had been trusted to take the infant for an airing in a perambulator, left her charge for a few minutes while she went to speak to her soldier lover. She stayed longer than she intended and when she returned, the child had disappeared. As it now appears, the infant had been stolen by a man who hoped to make money by its possession. Judging from its dress that it was the child of wealthy parents, he thought he would have no difficulty in securing a ransom for it. But he was a weak man and was scared by the storm of indignation that was aroused by the crime. He was afraid to make any movement toward getting the reward and eventually decided to keep the child for a time until he could make a bargain with greater safety. His wife grew fond of the boy and under her care he thrived and, as they removed to another town she passed him off as her own. Soon afterward her husband died and then her conscience pricking her she resolved to restore the child. But she did not know how to do it without running a risk of punishment for her share in the crime. Finally, she secured a position as servant in the employ of the child's parents whom she had traced to Akron. She ingratiated herself with them and, as they had no child of their own, entreated them to adopt her son whom she showed them. He was a bright lad of nine years by that time and the couple accepted her offer. She remained in their service for several years watching the boy grow up, but clinging to her guilty secret. About a year ago she announced that she was going to see relatives in England and left them. A few weeks ago they received a letter from her confessing the whole story and begging to be forgiven. The couple could scarcely believe that their adopted son was their own child, but their joy when they realized the fact can be imagined. The boy, too, must be glad to learn that those who for the past ten years have treated him as their son are really his parents, and that he is bound to them not only as their heir but by bonds of blood. This is joy like that the Christian feels when he realizes that he is a son of God.

That we might receive the adoption of sons and because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying Abba Father. (Gal. 4:5.)

Saved by Bible Reading.

In a sketch of the life of Col. P. Donan, the western orator, which appears in a Pittsburg journal, it is stated that the Colonel's life was once saved by his giving a Sunday morning to Bible reading instead of a game at cards. Some years ago during a journey from New Orleans to St. Louis, he was invited by some friends on board the steamer to join them in a game of poker in the cabin. It was Sunday morning and although the Colonel made no profession of religion, his early training made the suggestion seem shocking to him. He refused, but his friends persisted, and to prevent further pressure he retired to his state room. While there he analyzed his feelings and it seemed to him that he had objected to the game somewhat inconsistently. He was not a Christian, yet he was denying himself on Christian scruples. He remembered that he had a Bible in one of his valises, given him by a Christian friend. He found it and became interested. The poker game was forgotten and he read more than an hour. He was aroused at last by a terrific explosion which shook the steamer from stem to stern. He ran to the deck and as he passed the cabin he saw that the explosion had been just under it and every one of the friends who had made up the poker party was dead. The steamer was sinking, but Colonel Donan managed to get a place on one of the boats with the other passengers and was picked up three miles down stream. Probably few persons owe their lives as he did to a Bible reading, but there must be an immense number who owe to it the salvation of their souls which is infinitely more important.

Thou hast known the Holy Scriptures which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus. (1 Tim. 3:15.)

A Lover's Quarrel.

In the recently published reminiscences of a clergyman in Missouri, he mentions a mysterious failure to keep a marriage appointment which he had never been able to fathom. One evening he was called to see a young couple who wanted him to marry them. Witnesses, however, were necessary; and the clergyman left the attention to the fact that the better the portrait was, the more strongly marked was the curious dissimilarity in expression between the left and right halves of the face. "It is not," says the Times, "quite easy to see, when the portrait is looked at as a whole, but if a sheet of paper is placed first on one side of the median line of the face and then on the other, the change from benignant to severity is almost startling. It is as though the picture disclosed, not one man, but two. Indeed, that is exactly what it does, for on the left is the man who said 'Let us have peace,' and on the other he who determined to fight it out on a chosen line though to do so took all Summer. This same characteristic has been noticed in the portraits of other men, and perhaps all display it in some degree, but rarely has the change been at once so marked and so easily explicable by a knowledge of the mind that lay behind the features. In most of such cases, too, the unlike expressions are a revelation of traits hitherto unknown or only suspected; here they are confirmation of a belief founded on other and better evidence. That a man's face should disclose now this and now that trait of his character is inevitable, but that it can show several of them at the same time is a fact by no means so familiar or so well appreciated." We recognize readily how this may be when human character is analyzed, but we are apt to ignore it when we study the divine character. Too many forget that God is just, as well as loving though we are assured that there are both sides to his character.

Behold therefore the goodness and severity of God. (Rom. 11:23.)

A Farmer's Loss.

The story of the recent loss by a Rhode Island farmer of a valuable flock of geese is reported in the Providence Journal. It states that the farmer, who lives in the Pawtuxet Valley, has been carefully tending for about a year a flock of wild geese by which he set great store. They started from about thirty birds which last spring were part of a flock that flew over his farm. The farmer, with his son and friends, were out shooting when they saw the wild geese coming. They brought down about forty of them, and of these thirty were so slightly wounded that in a few days they seemed to be none the worse for their hurts. They were kept in a large enclosure covered with wire netting, and having plenty to eat, appeared to be quite contented in their new surroundings. The flock increased to seventy birds, and the young goslings were healthy and vigorous. They appeared to have no desire to use their wings, and the farmer believed them to be quite domesticated. A few days ago he allowed them to go into the adjoining field to feast on the young grass that was sprouting there. The flock appeared to enjoy the fresh provender, and wandered contentedly about the field. They seemed to have no thought of escaping, and the experiment was deemed a success. But later in the day there was a change. The farmer heard the familiar sound of "Honk! honk!" which told him of the approach of another flock of wild geese, and looking upward, he saw the black, snaky line of the birds coming over the Coventry hills. His own birds, that he had been tenderly rearing with the prospect of profit to come, heard the sound, too, and recognized it. Instantly there was a flutter in the flock; wings unused for a year and wings that had never been used, were spread, and in a minute the whole flock had risen to join the line winding far up in the air. All the farmer's visions of profit that was to recompense his trouble and care vanished with them, much to his chagrin. He realized then the truth of the wise king's warning, which with him had been literally fulfilled, as it has been figuratively fulfilled in numberless instances:

Riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven. (Prov. 23:5.)

couple together while he summoned two members of his household to act in that capacity. When he returned, the prospective bridegroom informed him that he and the bride had been talking the matter over and had concluded to postpone the marriage to the next day. The clergyman acquiesced and a time was fixed for the ceremony. The couple went away, leaving the license with the clergyman. They did not appear at the time appointed and they never presented themselves afterwards. He never obtained the slightest clue to the nature of the difficulty which arose at that late hour, but it was evidently a serious one. Doubtless, he like other ministers, has witnessed similar failures in spiritual experience. Many who have seemed on the point of accepting Christ and becoming united by faith to him have postponed doing so until a future time and have never kept their promise. The decision postponed is apt never to be made.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Preaching to the Gentiles.

Sunday School Lesson for May 16th. Acts

14: 11-22. Golden Text: Acts 13: 47.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

PAUL and Barnabas driven by persecution out of Antioch in Pisidia came to Iconium in Galatia. The revelation of God to him that henceforth he should go unto the Gentiles, did not cause Paul to love the Jews less, or to fail in observing the order "to the Jews first." Therefore in Iconium as elsewhere, he and Barnabas resorted to the synagogue. But his new light upon the vocation which had been given him at the time of his conversion (Acts 9: 15), and to which he had yielded himself only little by little, influenced his preaching, he "so spake that a great multitude of the Jews and also of the Greeks believed." Of course Persecution Arose.

"The god of this world" could not see his kingdom thus invaded without stirring up the strongest opposition. Through the unbelieving Jews, the Gentiles also were stirred up against these two witnesses of Christ. Paul and Barnabas had no command from God to depart: "Long time therefore abode they speaking boldly in the Lord, which gave testimony unto the Word of his grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands," just as he had promised. (Mark 16: 17-18.)

But the rebellious natural heart which will not retain God in its knowledge (Rom. 1: 28), is not open to conviction. Ignoring God, unbelievers will take for granted that all the power which they see in the children of God is of evil origin, and they deal with them accordingly. The whole city was divided, some holding with the Jews, some with the Apostles: and, when at last, the adverse party showed signs of using violence, Paul and Barnabas understood that their time was come to move farther. "When they persecute you in one city, flee ye into another." (Matt. 10: 23.) Did they pity themselves as though some strange thing happened unto them? No; they would rejoice inasmuch as they were partakers of Christ's sufferings. The enduring of persecution, the being thwarted in the work just when all seemed to be so flourishing, was as much a part of their vocation as the preaching of the Gospel. It was an absolute necessity that it should be manifest what manner of spirit they were of. Is it less necessary in our day? And yet, is it indeed a recognized part of the spiritual outfit of an evangelist or a missionary that he should be able readily, even joyously to accept at the hand of God the hindrances which evil disposed persons may put in the way of his ministry? Are there not many Christian workers who are more ready to contend with men than to yield to God?

Arrived at Lystra, in the whole neighborhood of which city "they preached the Gospel," there was among their auditors a helpless cripple, who had never walked. This was one of their most eager listeners; he heard wondrous tidings for soul and body, and he felt, this good news is for me. Paul soon discovered the receptive spirit of the cripple. Steadfastly beholding him, and looking far below the surface, he perceived that he had and said with a loud voice, "Stand upright on thy feet and he leaped and walked." There was a response of the man's soul to God, which accepted for himself instant deliverance; he gave credit to the God whom Paul preached for the power and will to deliver him. He did not lean on Paul, he did not try an experiment, he trusted the living God. His fellow countrymen, full of idolatrous ideas, cried out "The Gods are come down to us in the like ness of men," and they sought to identify Barnabas with Jupiter, whom they imagined to be the God of heaven, and Paul with Mercury, supposed to Jupiter's special messenger; because he was the chief speaker. And so set were they on their ideas that they made preparation to offer sacrifices to them. As soon as Paul understood the situation, he and Barnabas ran in among the people declaring they were men like themselves, but sent to preach that they should turn them from their vanities or vain things, to serve, not an ideal, or poetical God, but the living God, "who made heaven and earth and the sea and all things that are therein." This was the point, would they give up this religion of unreal gods, and accept their responsibilities to the one true and living God? This is the one question in the mission field now. All the world over, there is a belief in one Supreme Being, a sense of accountability to him, a certain idea of judgment to come. But the natural heart in an unenlightened, so-called Christian land, as well as in a dark and superstitious heathen land, shrinks from coming face to face with the living God. Any amount of priests, any demand in the way stoned him should learn that a man of God cannot be slain without his permission. Policy had no voice in the movements of this man of God. Like his Master before him, his steps were guided and prepared from on high. He had left behind him a testimony to the one true God; he had shown how little he feared man; he had shown how in his eyes, neither ease, nor life itself, was anything worth in comparison to the importance of his mission to preach Christ and to win men to him. "The next day he departed with Barnabas to Derbe." "And when they had preached the Gospel to that city, and had taught many, they returned again to Lystra and to Iconium and to Antioch."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

IT is strange how different are the results of teaching on different persons. Here in Antioch, Paul's sermon stirs up some to hatred and opposition and others to faith and joy. It is the same house, the same speaker, and the same message, yet different effects. Our version says that "as many as were ordained to eternal life believed," but the real meaning of the words is that as many as put themselves in order believed, that is as many as were in harmony, or yielded themselves. That is still the rule. The hearers who accept the teaching and who put it in practice, are they who discover its value and its helpfulness. But the opposition prevailed, as it too often does to this day, and the two missionaries were driven out. We reverence majorities, but the majority is nearly always wrong; it is the of sacrifices, but nothing to do with the living God. There is an instinct in every human heart that the true God is not to be trifled with, and to know him is to submit to him, and this so large a number are quite unwilling to do.

But there are those in every land whose hunger after a real living God is intense; they want, at any cost, to know that they may serve him. Such was the crippled man, but such were not his fellow countrymen. It needed but the visit of a few Jews from Antioch and Iconium who, not content with driving out the servants of God from their own cities, came to Lystra to hunt them out, and the multitude were as ready to execute lynch law upon Paul and Barnabas as they had been to offer them worship so short a time before. Thus it seemed as though Paul were to end his life by a martyrdom like Stephen's. But how then would the word of God be fulfilled which said of him: "He is a chosen vessel unto me to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel" (Acts 9: 15)? As yet Paul had preached before no kings, he could not die until his ministry should be accomplished.

Paul was stoned, and his assailants "drew his body out of the city." But the believing ones stood around him and, whether dead or alive we are not told, only that he arose "and came into the city." Did he not fear? Was it not presumption to thus defy his enemies? Paul knew the leadings of the Spirit, it may have been necessary that those who remnant, the few men of sense and character, who are right. The truth and the right are usually beaten when the test is a counting of hands. Still, the truth was not to be forced on any one. The teachers had done their duty when they had delivered their message. If the people would not receive it, or, as Paul said, judged themselves unworthy, that was their affair. Henceforth he would speak to those who would listen. The two missionaries then went to Iconium, a town about sixty miles away to the southeast. It is now called Koniye, and has a population of about twenty thousand souls. The preachers seem to have remained there during the winter and spring. There was a similar division there to that at Antioch, and as there is wherever the Gospel is preached, and when it took the form of violence, they left Iconium and went to Lystra, a town about twenty-five miles to the south-west. The sermon there was probably in the open air. The presence of the cripple seems to imply a place where such a man might sit and beg. This man had faith. It was not every man on whom a miracle could be worked. The yielding spirit to which reference has already been made was essential. Paul, looking earnestly at him, recognized it in his face, and bade him stand up. He obeyed, doubtless as much to his own astonishment, as to that of the people. It is a significant fact that the record does not mention Paul's use of the customary formula of giving his command in the name of Christ. Whether he did use it and Luke omitted to mention it, we do not know. Perhaps the command in the very words and that may account for the homage that followed. THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

MAY-DAY FROLICS.

How the Festival Was Celebrated in Olden Times and How it is Kept To-day.

BACK in the early beginnings of time, when "all the world was young," the Mayday festival was kept, in various forms, by the people laying claim to a degree of civilization, as the festival to which ushered in the "growing" when all nature gave evidence of it and the earth put on her robes of green and yellow and gold. The name of the festival is of doubtful origin, and is derived from Maia the mother of the gods, but from a much older source, according to some authorities, from the Magis or Magus, which came in from the Sanskrit Mah, ("to signify" the "rooting" or "growing"). It was a custom in heathen times to sacrifice on the first day of May.

By the morning, the Roman gods and maidens went into the fields, singing songs in honor of Maia and of Flora, goddess of fruits and flowers. Nearly English times, the festival was dedicated to merry-making, and the young of both sexes gambled about on the green, around the May-pole. People of all ranks rose up and went "a-Maying," to come the advent of the festival and gathered branches of hawthorn and flowers to deck the ground and weave into garlands. Some parts of England the festival is the occasion of a very elaborate observance. The spiritual leaders attended early, marched to the festival and returned bearing a banner on which they hung flowers, garlands and other tokens of the festival. On one of these gatherings when archery was in vogue, the English king assembled his court at the May-green and directed the games.

In later times, in our own country, the old-style May celebration has been almost lost sight of. May-day itself has passed into the domain of legend, but the festival is still a special sea of joy and out-door merriment among the juveniles. Our history shows a May celebration in Prospect Park, Brooklyn, with the children and not a few adults, marching gleefully over the yielding grass. In the foreground a group of young girls are carrying a diminutive May-pole decorated with bays. Such celebrations, as well as those that are held in connection with the anniversary gatherings, are a revival of the festival of ancient times.

Only Boy!

More than a half century ago, a faithful minister coming early to church met one of his deacons, whose face wore a very pale but distressed expression. "I am nearly to meet you," he said. "I have something on my conscience to say to you. Pastor, there must be something seriously wrong in your preaching and in the church there has been only one person who has been in the church in a whole year, and he is only a boy."

"He?" said the old man: "but I have heard of that boy." The old minister went to the pulpit that day with a heavy and heavy heart. He closed his eyes with dim and tearful eyes. He remained. No one? "Only a boy." He watched the trembling old man. His soul is filled with loving sympathy. He went to him and laid his hand on his black coat. "Do you think if I were willing to work hard for an education, I could ever become a preacher?" he asked. "A preacher?" "Perhaps a missionary."

There was a long pause. Tears filled the eyes of the old minister. At length he said: "I see the divine hand now. God bless you my boy. Yes, I think you will become a preacher."

Years afterward, there returned to London, from Africa, an aged missionary. His name was spoken with reverence. When he went into an assembly the people rose; when he spoke in public there was a deep silence. Princes stood uncovered before him; nobles invited him to their homes. He had added a province to the Church of Christ on earth, had brought under the Gospel influence the most savage of African chiefs, had given the translated Bible to strange tribes, had enriched with valuable knowledge the Royal Geographical Society, and had honored the humble place of his birth, the Scottish kirk, and the universal missionary cause.

The old minister sleeps beneath the trees in the humble place of his labors,

"One little boy in a heathen family attended a mission school and, with his secular lessons, learned the stories of the Bible and many of its beautiful verses. As he grew older he felt that the idols worshiped by his parents and all his people were not gods and could not save his soul. Several other young men felt just as he did, his younger brother among them, and finally they decided to become Christians. Immediately their friends began to persecute them so much that all went back except this young man and his brother. These two were faithful to Jesus, and refused to go back to their heathen ways. So they were turned out of their home and went to a training school to become teachers. There they were baptized and admitted to the Christian Church. Since then they have both become teachers, and the older one is now a highly valued and useful instructor in the theological school."

A Boy's Ambition.

A healthy desire to rise in the world is to be commended. An observant pastor, writing on this point, makes the distinction between the ambitious lad and the boy who does not possess the rising quality. He writes: "The boy goes to business, and at his business begins by simply doing the things he is told to do, and doing them in a common and ordinary way. If he stops here, he remains all his life long a drudge. But if he begins to see that business has a significance, that his

LIZZIE C. HARDY.

A CHILD'S FAITH.

THERE were just three persons in the room: father, mother, and little girl. It was a very solemn moment indeed, and the darkness and gloom of the chamber added more to the solemnity. The little daughter, who had been a member of one of our Sunday Schools, and had found a knowledge of the truth as it was in Jesus Christ, was lying upon her death-bed. The mother and father were bending over the weak and helpless form, gazing upon the pallid countenance, although the Sun of Righteousness was shedding his golden sunbeams in the heart of the child.

She seemed happy as she quoted text after text of Scripture. Such passages as, "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven," and "O God, thou art my God, early will I seek thee," and, "In my Father's house are many mansions, if it were not so I would have told you: I go to prepare a place for you," all seemed to rise before her as if they were written by the hand of Almighty God upon the foot of the bedstead; as the strange handwriting appeared upon the wall at the feast of Belshazzar. Her father and mother could not see the words, but as the little one went over them again and again, her face became illuminated with the light of the everlasting Gospel, and her mind carried her back to the days when she was able to attend Sunday School. She seemed to rest easily; she was conscious that the hour of her departure was close at hand. She feared no evil, because Christ was with her. She was not afraid of death because she was going from the arms of her mother into the everlasting arms of Jesus. She did not dread passing through the waters, for she had learned that when she passed through the waters, God would be near her.

She was nearing the end. The mother was tenderly leaning over her. "Oh, mother!" said she, "I see the pearly gates opening before me, the music of the angels charms me. The angels are waiting and watching for me. I see brother and sister waiting to welcome me to the home that has been prepared for me."

At this, the tears trickled down the parents' cheeks. They realized their own littleness. Her words seemed to strike the uttermost depths of their hearts. "Don't cry," said the little angel. "I am going to a land where God shall wipe all tears away from the eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain." And she added: "And when you come, mamma, I will meet you there, too."

If you speak to that goodly mother to-day about the departed child, she will tell you that her little one was the joy of her life, and that she had more faith in God than any person she ever knew. Her heart still languishes for the little girl, but she has one consolation, and that is that the child has gone to rest with her Heavenly Father, and that she was carried by the angels to that land of rest. How true are those words which were spoken by Isaiah, "A little child shall lead them." F. V. C. C.

Children in India.

In a recent letter, Rev. John S. Chandler of Madura, describes most interestingly some phases of peasant child-life in India:

"Children in India sometimes eat off plates made of banyan leaves pinned together by straws. Their food is rice with a little curry made pungent by red peppers. They use their hands to eat with, and then throw away the leafy plates where dogs will come and lick up the remains of food. The clothing they wear is a single cloth apiece and necklaces and bracelets for the girls. As children grow older the girls are occupied more and more in the houses, and the boys in the fields.

"Boys have to do more outdoor work, following usually the occupations of their fathers. Many are poor, and get a living by watching the grazing cattle. The cattle and buffaloes of a village are committed to them in the morning, and they drive them about over fields wherever there is pasture until the evening, when they are brought back in herds to their owners. These children learn much evil from their superstitious and ignorant parents, but they are capable of learning that which is good and true.

life is not merely sweeping the store, not merely writing letters, not merely selling goods; if he begins to see the higher life involved in business, if he begins to see that business is a greater instrument of beneficence than what we call beneficence; that trade is clothing thousands of men where charity clothes ten; that agricultural and milling industries are feeding thousands of men where charity feeds ten; if he begins to see how the whole history of the world is linked together, and is God's way of building up humanity and serving humanity—as he gets this large view and enters into it, life is enriched and becomes the school wherein he is educated into that which is immortal."

"Tying the Knot."

Just where this familiar phrase, connected with the marriage ceremony, originated, is not generally understood. It has been discovered, however, by an eminent investigator, that a certain part of the wedding ceremony among the Babylonians was very significant. The priest took a thread from the garment of the bride, and another from the garment of the bridegroom, and tied them into a knot, which he gave to the bride. This is probably the origin of the modern saying about "tying the knot" in regard to marriage, which is so generally used.

The Bondage of Housework.

THE bondage of housework is less grinding and oppressive than it once was, because our modern conveniences have lightened labor, and introduced labor-saving contrivances into our kitchens, yet it is still sufficiently hard to eat like corroding rust into many a woman's life.

Men work from sun to sun,
But woman's work is never done, is as true an adage as was ever spoken. Think of it, from Monday's steaming tubs to Saturday's shining floors, what a stretch of care-taking, and stepping around, and pulling down, and cleaning, and baking, and setting tables, and washing dishes, and mending trousers, and darning stockings, and making beds, and going to market, and smiling in the faces of husband and children no matter how tired you are, what a wonderful stretch it is. Years ago I sat down in the middle of my house-keeping one morning, and wrote

God help us through the common days,
The level stretches white with dust!

Truly we women need help from above just to keep sweet and calm and tender and loving through our years of housewifely work!

Now, that I have said this, I hasten to add that I believe in good house-keeping! If you undertake anything in this world of God's, from sweeping out corners to carving statues, see to it that you bring to the task the best that is in you, that you work thoroughly, promptly and efficiently. Don't leave loose ends to ravel out. Don't half do.

Whatsoever thou doest do with thy might. And if thy might be, as sometimes happens, utter weakness, still let the endeavor be made to perform the task of the day with skill and diligence.

Still some of us take our house-keeping duties in too strenuous a spirit. We wage so unremitting a war upon dust that we return to dust sooner than we need to. There are graves hollowed in New England church yards and on the edges of Western prairies, over which might be inscribed:

Here lies a poor woman who never could stop,
She toiled and she slaved, and one day saw her drop,
Now she sleeps with the just, and the world spins away.

And she did not live out even half of her day.

Depend upon it, there are worse foes than mere surface dust. Once having made the house decently clean for the day, there is no sense in flourishing around with whisk brooms, and feathers, and damp cloths, all the afternoon. Wait to renew the contest until to-morrow.

Teach the children to help you. Teach the boys to help you. I shall never forget the superb disdain of a small five-year-old comrade of mine, whom I once invited to help me make a bed. The mite drew himself up, and threw back his sheaf of sunny curls with a toss of his head and a flash of his blue eyes.

"I can't help you! Its woman's work!" "Why no," I explained, "it is man's work, dear. Soldiers and sailors make their own beds, and so does cousin Tom up at West Point. It takes strong and clever people to make beds properly!"

Immediately my cause was won. And I taught my little friend to do much more than that to fetch and carry and save the steps, and the strength of his sisters, to make coffee and tea, to take hold of my work and do it well. Boys can do a lot of the work that women wear another shoulder, and if only taught to do so, they will do it willingly.

Children can lighten the load by early learning to put their own playthings and their clothes in proper places when either happens not to be in use. I am doubly sorry when I see a mother picking up after her flock. She is teaching them to be helpless, and to need waiting on, and she is losing part of the strength she should keep in reserve for herself. "Its queen," said a sensible old lady once, "but the best mothers sometimes have the worst daughters." She meant in the contrast between capability and inefficiency which one sometimes sees, the strong resolute mother, having daughters in every particular her opposites.

There is a golden word which needs to be spoken over and over in the ear of American women, and it is this: "Rest when you are tired."

Slip away from the children and the work, and sit down with folded hands and shut eyes in the sunshine of the morning or the quiet of the afternoon. Lie down for a half hour in your own room in the dark. Go and take a walk, even if you leave your work unfinished. Let things wait. Do not allow life to make you a drudge. You are in command of life.

Take to your weary heart, dear tired sisters, this bit of comfort:

Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.
Take no thought for the morrow. The morrow shall take thought for the things of itself.
Your father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him.

Oh! the sweet blessedness of that assurance before ye ask him! Do you remember the story of the dear old Bishop who, after a very hard day, just folded his hands and said: "Thou knowest Lord we are on the same old terms!"

Don't clutter the house up with too many pretty things. They are charming, these scarfs, and vases, and curios, and pieces of china which the taste of the day has brought into our homes, but rather than have to care for them, with my own hands and eyes, I would have a room, bare and old-fashioned, with a marble-topped table, a photograph album, six chairs and a sofa with its back against the wall. Every added ornament is an added care, and the woman who does her own work, and I have her in mind while writing this talk, must avoid superfluities. There is another reason, too, for eliminating useless bric-a-brac. The little ones can't be scolded for spoiling it, if it isn't there to spoil.

Last of all, take the noble and dignified attitude toward housework, that robs even bondage of alarms. This everyday care is making a home nest for husband and children. It is done for my dear ones, let the wife and the mother say, and work for their comfort can never be considered petty or a waste of time. Only as one toils in a mean and unworthy spirit, is told a degradation of one's powers. The woman who looks at her housekeeping from the right point of view, carries it forward with amiability and practical good sense, and makes its tributary to her home-making, is not merely a little lower than the angels. She is already an angel herself, with the Lord of the angels giving her his benediction.

Siam's King Coming Here.

Chulalongkorn and a Train of Oriental Dignitaries to Visit Us in September—A Progressive Young Ruler.

UNCLE SAM'S sons and daughters will have the pleasure, sometime next fall, of welcoming to these free and enlightened shores, the reigning monarch of ancient Siam, King Chulalongkorn I., and a portion of his imperial Court. Readers of this journal are already somewhat familiar with the character and career of this progressive young Eastern monarch, whose enlightened rule has been the means of pushing his kingdom well to the front among Asiatic nations. His portrait with that of his Queen is given on this page.

Chulalongkorn was born in 1852, and was chosen King by the Senabodee or Supreme Council of State in 1868, and crowned the same year, the chief of the Senabodee being appointed Regent during the King's minority. Like all his predecessors Siam's ruler has a most wonderful and elongated name which is used in all official documents. It is as follows.

lished postal facilities, connected by telegraph with China and the world, caused the erection of lig and buoys along the coast, surveyed the navigable streams, enacted a new code of laws and an judicial system, inaugurated a system of public instruction, protected religious liberty throughout his domain, forbade official interference with converts on Sunday, built hospitals, suffering, opened an art museum, the number of Europeans and in his service, reorganized the army and the municipal police, and encouraged his people to an exemplary life to be temperate, upright, industrious and humane.

Chulalongkorn is temperate, serious, and a very hard worker in his service. In his government has established a system of rev promotions for merit which is superior in its operation to the old method of promoting favorites office, irrespective of capacity, strictly a business ruler, and set a good example in all that public and national affairs. His liberal attitude towards Christians and converts has won warm friends among the strange kingdom. He is one of the best enlightened Buddhist rulers that has produced.

Twenty-One Year's Progress.

The West Side Noon-Day Prayer Meeting Celebrates its Twenty-First Anniversary.

THE West Side Noon-Day Prayer Meeting recently celebrated its twenty-first anniversary at its room, 100 Greenwich Street, New York. The occasion was one of great interest.

Dr. A. C. Dixon delivered the address, which was full of helpful suggestions. A report covering the twenty-one years of the meeting was read by the chairman of the Executive Committee, Mr. Joseph B. Dixon, showing that the meeting was organized in 1876, during the religious revival following the preaching of Dwight L. Moody. The constituent members were first business men of the West side. The organization has continued without intermission, a noon-hour of every business day is given to the organization. Except at special occasions this has not been what would be called a large meeting, but it has had many features of blessing and spiritual growth. The organization has been able to devote more time to special cases, more carefully and patiently dealt with. Many incidents show how God has blessed the meeting.

A young man living on a farm in Vermont came to New York on business and being anxious about his soul, was directed by a policeman to the West Side Noon-Day Meeting. He attended but had not the courage to make his desire to be a Christian. He wrote home, and sent a written request for prayer to the meeting, giving his address. His case was remembered by one of the brethren, feeling interested, followed up the prayers by writing a letter. This opened a correspondence, and in the course of a few months a letter came bearing the news of his conversion, which took place in July, 1878. He afterwards visited the meeting and gave a precious testimony of God's saving power. Since then his life and work have been carefully watched by members of the meeting, testifying to his unflagging zeal, his faithfulness, his whole-hearted consecration. Many have also been won to Christ through his labors, with a desire to preach the Gospel to the heathen, he entered college at Middlebury, in October, 1881, was ordained, and he and his wife went to India, where he is now laboring under appointment of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. Many other remarkable conversions might be mentioned.

The prayers of the readers of this paper are requested for the blessing of God upon the efforts of the West Side Noon-Day Prayer Meeting, and that its circulation may be a means of the conversion of sinners.

THE BEST IN LIFE.

Things in Life are Worth Living to and How to Attain Them.

What the best thing in life really is, is a problem that has perplexed many a man beside Ecclesiastes. Some never honestly ask themselves the question, but drift through life, thoughtlessly following the bits of their older friends, and which gives them most pleasure. Others, the opportunity of it not within their reach. The part of their time and the best of mind and body have to be given to the earning of a livelihood. The rest in toil and the night in rest, for the toil of the next day. The conditions of our lives have become so severe, and the competition so severe, that the struggle for existence absorbs all our mental and physical powers to such an extent that there is no possibility for anything else. Whatsoever may be the aspirations of the man, he must set them aside that he may keep in the ranks and not fall, to be under foot. For such beings there is only pity, and year by year the number increases, as labor-saving devices dispense with the need of strength and competitors struggle together for the privilege of resting in toil. Perhaps when we are in a more intelligent social condition we may attain the security of a life that is always sure that shelter will be his. But until we reach that point many must be that of the man who is driven to his labor and must not do many things worth living for. But even when a man has decided to start with and the possibility of choice is within reach, it does not happen that he seeks or desires things that are worth living for. The class which has in possession of things which are esteemed the things of life, there are more of them than bored people than in any other class. They who blunder and are disappointed and who complain that the world is a mere Dead Sea fruit, and that of giving permanent satisfaction to people to be envied, by any means.

The passage associated with the words of John 2: 12-17, we are introduced to a different class of objects in the world esteems. The people interested in the people to whom John is writing because they have these objects. He sees everything passing away, the world itself disappearing and everything pertaining to it. The people remain—they abide. They have attained the dream of the alchemists who vainly sought the elixir of life, which was to be the immortality. "He that doeth will abide forever." Here is the thing worth living for. Not the endless existence, which might be wearisome, but the coming into the divine will which assures development. John sees the things beginning with the forgiveness of sins; then overcoming the world, and yielding to its maxims and precepts, or to accept its ideals; and the fathers who know Christ who are the beginning. They have so much with him, and have learned to overcome what his love for them is imparting strength, and what he can effect as a motive, to know him and have his nature. They are they who do the will of God and live forever. To live so as to be one with Christ and therefore one with the world. To be in the world, but not of it. To be surrounded by evil, to be assailed by emotion and to overcome all. To be pure, but an aggressive force in evil. Such attainments dwarf the influence the acquisition of for power, or fame. And these attainments are possible to all. They are in such of the humblest, the poorest, the most despised. To be like Christ, to have patience and forbearance and love and tenderness—that is the thing of a noble ambition that is worth living. The child in the home, the young man in college, the artisan in the workshop, the business man in his office—all engage in this struggle.

THE CHORUS OF THE FLOWERS.

OH, such a commotion under the ground
When March called "Ho, there! ho!"
Such spreading of rootlets far and wide,
Such whisperings to and fro;
And "Are you ready?" the Snowdrop asked;
"Tis time to start, you know."
"Almost, my dear," the Scilla replied;
"I'll follow as soon as you go."
Then "Ha! ha! ha!" a chorus came
Of laughter soft and low.
From the millions of flowers under the ground—
Yes—millions—beginning to grow.

"I'll promise my blossoms," the Crocus said,
"When I heard the bluebirds sing;"
And straight thereafter Narcissus cried,
"My silver and gold I'll bring."
"And ere they are dulled," another spoke,
"The Hyacinth bells shall ring."
And the Violet only murmured, "I'm here."
And sweet the air of spring.
Then "Ha! ha! ha!" a chorus came
Of laughter soft and low.
From the millions of flowers under the ground—
Yes—millions—beginning to grow.

Oh, the pretty, brave things! through the coldest day
Imprisoned in walls of brown, [loud,
They never lost heart though the blast shrieked
And the sleet and the hail came down,
But patiently each wrought her beautiful dress,
Or fashioned her beautiful crown; [world,
And now they are coming to brighten the Still shadowed by winter's frown;
And well may they cheerily laugh "Ha! ha!"
In a chorus soft and low,
The millions of flowers hid under the ground,
Yes—millions—beginning to grow.

THE CHRISTIAN'S COMFORT.

SWEET to reflect how grace divine
My sins on Jesus laid;
Sweet to remember that his blood
My debt of suffering paid.
Sweet on his faithfulness to rest,
Whose love can never end;
Sweet on his covenant of grace
For all things to depend.
If such the views which grace unfolds,
Weak as it is below,
What raptures must the Church above
In Jesus' presence know!

HIATUS IN PROPHECY.

The Interval Separating Daniel's Sixty-ninth from his Seventieth Week.

BY T. B. BAINES

DANIEL'S prophecy of seventy weeks says: "From the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem unto the Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks, and three score and two weeks . . . and after the threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be cut off, and shall have nothing. (Dan. 9: 25, 26, see margin.) Sixty-nine weeks had elapsed, therefore, before Christ's death. But if sixty-nine weeks had closed then, and the seventieth week has not closed yet, what conclusion can we draw? Simply this, that as these weeks relate only to the Jews, the time during which God's dealings with the Jews are suspended is not counted. Now, owing to their rejection of Christ, the Jews are at present set entirely aside, and God is engaged in bringing in "the fulness of the Gentiles." The clock of prophetic time has, therefore, stopped with the cutting off of Messiah, and will not beat out its last week until the fulness of the Gentiles having come in, God resumes his dealings with Israel.

The interval is a prophetic blank, the "many days," during which the children of Israel abide "without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim." (Hos. 3: 4.) But, while entering into no details, it may be well to glance at God's dealings with the Jews from their rejection to their restoration.

Messiah is cut off, and does not receive the kingdom. Then the Roman people destroy the city, and desolation reigns until the end of this great national controversy. This is the only reference made to the interval between the destruction of Jerusalem and the last week.

After foretelling the cutting off of Messiah, Daniel adds: "And the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. And he shall confirm a covenant with the many for one week; and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined shall be poured upon the desolator. (Dan. 9: 26, 27.)

Our Lord makes a like omission. "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled. And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars." (Luke 21: 24, 25.) The whole space between the siege of Jerusalem by Titus and the troubles preceding the coming of the Son of Man is passed over in silence.

But to return to Daniel. For the last seven years before Israel's restoration, there is a person who confirms a covenant with "the many," or mass of the Jewish people, for a week. This person must be "the prince that shall come," named in the previous verse. But that prince is the prince of the people that destroyed Jerusalem; he is, therefore, the head of the Roman Empire, which thus appears once more upon the scene in these which we have very good reason to believe are the closing days of the times of the Gentiles.

A covenant for seven years is concluded between him and the mass of the Jews, who have then returned to Jerusalem and revived their old sacrifices. In the middle of that time he makes the sacrifice to cease, and an abomination or idol is set up, causing desolation to the end of the epoch, when some predetermined fate overtakes the desolator. This last half-week, when wickedness and misery culminate, is three and a-half years, or "a time, times, and half a time," or forty and two months or one thousand two hundred and sixty days, expressions which we find frequently recurring in the description of these fearful events preceding the restoration of Israel, and the establishment of Messianic reign. (Dan. 7: 25; Rev. 11: 2, 3; 12: 6, 14; 13: 5.)

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

CHAPTER X—Cont'd.
A Great Victory.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

THE parlor of the Lloyd mansion was darkened to keep out the heat. The house was very still. Mr. Rives had to wait twenty minutes before Alice was ready to see him, and in that twenty minutes thoughts that he could not prevent crowded even gratified revenge to the wall. Since Nicholas Lloyd so wantonly wronged him a great tide of events had flowed between them, and the straits of Time widened and widened; but he had never forgotten the wrong, never ceased to watch for an opportunity to repay it, with interest. The opportunity had come, and he had taken every advantage of it. In a few minutes he would taste the sweetest morsel of his revenge, for he resolved to tell Miss Lloyd the story of the far-back injury, and leave her no grounds for doubting who it was that had come between her and Lord Medway.

When Alice entered the room he saw at once that she had been weeping, but it did not move him to pity, for his anger, ingrained, had become a hatred which desired its satisfaction, even upon the innocent. And if his injustice touched him at all, he reminded himself that his own daughter's prospects had been blighted just on the verge of her womanhood by the sudden poverty which Nicholas Lloyd had brought on him. "Tis but justice, bare justice," he muttered; "my girl suffered the wreck of all her hopes; his girl shall suffer as mine did. Yes, I will spare her nothing."

As he was thus instructing himself, Alice entered. She was dressed in white, even to her shoes; and as she stood in the dim room, she made a kind of radiance. He was startled by her pallor, by her air of noble sorrow, and by her large proud eyes, which affected him like an accusation.

"You are Mr. Rives?" she asked, advancing a little, but declining, by a slight motion, the chair he offered.

"I am. I called to tell you that Lord Medway left for England this morning."

"I know it, sir."

"Ah!" he ejaculated. He could only imagine that Medway, in spite of his advice to the contrary, had written to her, and he was slightly dashed by this unconscious throwing back of his first stone. But he continued with more animus:

"I do not know when he will return."

"He will not return at all."

Irritated by this calm, positive assertion, he denied at once its truth. "He will return about Christmas, I think."

"You are mistaken, sir. He will not return."

"How do you know that?" he asked sharply. And she made no answer, for how could she tell him that he saw only with his eyes, but that she saw with her heart?

The profound silence that ensued was most embarrassing, though it lasted but a minute. Indeed, he forced with brutal directness a passage through it. "Mr. Lloyd is very ill, I suppose?"

"Very; he dies daily, by hours and minutes."

"Is he ever sufficiently sane to remember past events?"

"Sometimes he is. Do you wish me to ask him for some information?"

"Yes. I wish you to ask him to remember the twilight of October, twenty-three years ago. On that day he robbed me of all I had, and in so doing blasted my little Annette's prospects for life. By fraud and false promises he heaped damnation on himself, before God has damned him, and I hope he will go to the devil when that day comes round again."

He spoke with a rapid passion that admitted of no interruption, even if Alice had desired to interrupt him; but she stood still and white as death, looking at the accuser. Very soon, however, her stern voice broke the unnatural stillness that instantly followed the unnatural outbreak.

"God has brought his sins to his remembrance. My father does not require you or I to touch his memory. It would be well to pray that our sins be not so brought to remembrance. As to the future, Nicholas Lloyd has to do with Almighty God, and not with John Rives."

Her grave rebuke, severe in youthful beauty, had an invincible authority. He was ashamed of his profane, relentless cruelty, and he added, "If you only knew how cruelly he wronged me!"

"The reconciling grave is now between you. In a few weeks, or days, or hours, it may be too late to send the message you ought to send; for you must remember that your trespasses will be forgiven as you forgive those that have trespassed against you."

"If you only knew!" he reiterated: "if you only knew, you would not wonder that I hate."

"I am sorry for you. Hatred is such a bitter self-punishment. And very likely you judge my poor father too hardly. If he had committed any crime against his fellow-men the law—"

"He never committed a crime; he was too clever for that; but he did far worse to me."

"Well, then you have seen your desire on your enemy, as all those who suffer ultimately do. This is your opportunity. Forgive any wrong father has done you. If I ask him to remember John Rives, I must give him a merciful reason for doing so. What am I to say to him?"

"I cannot forgive him. Let him go to his own place."

"You also may need mercy some day, Mr. Rives. Is this the answer you wish to your prayer for it?"

"I cannot forgive Nicholas Lloyd; but I am sorry that I have so steadily worked against your marriage with Lord Medway. I regret that. I will try and undo that."

"You need not regret it, as far as I am concerned. All things will work together for my good, for I trust in One able to make them do so. Do not, therefore, try either to do or to undo in my affairs. I have committed my cause to God, and not to John Rives. But if you have the message of a Christian gentleman to send to my dying father, I will gladly take it."

She ceased speaking, and stood waiting, and the stillness was such as might be felt. The roll of the carriages outside the darkened windows only intensified it. Alice heard them as in a dream. John Rives heard nothing but the rapid beat, beat, beat of his heart, where anger and hatred remained as in a fort. But suddenly his sullen defiance heard a Voice, prophetic in its power, kingly in its authority, priestly in its blessing and cursing—the Voice of Conscience, of the pervading and besetting God—"Thou also art a mortal man." And he recognized the majesty of this reminder, and did reverence to that within him which is eternal.

"You may—tell—Nicholas Lloyd that—I forgive him," he said. The words were brokenly and softly spoken. Indeed, he hardly knew the tones of his own voice, and he was far down the avenue ere he understood fully that he had obeyed that wondrous Power which works neither by insinuation, flattery nor threat, but by simply holding up the naked law of God within the Soul—that Imperative which says to every man, if he will listen to it, "Thou ought," and "Thou must."

He did not look at Alice as he passed her, nor see the brightening paleness of her face, nor comprehend that he had been with one of those finer spirits, who amid the jar and jangle of daily life and the sighs and cries of suffering still keep the melodious memory of the everlasting chime. But Alice knew that she had been on a great battle field, and witnessed a great victory, and that henceforward that shrouded parlor must be a sacred place, for in it she had seen a sinful soul meet its Maker and render obedience.

"Surely," she whispered, "he has gone to his house justified. It is good for him and it is good for father. Poor father! When a man is fighting death it would be foul play indeed to let flesh and blood in terpose against him."

CHAPTER XI.

Steve is Wanted.

Steve was as yet ignorant of these events. After leaving his wife at the watering place she had chosen, he went straight to a little cot he knew of in the heart of the Hudson Highlands. It was the home of a wood-cutter and his wife, and there were no other homes near it. The old woman had cared for him before; the old man had the virtue of extreme reticence. Neither of them troubled themselves about Steve's coming and going; he gave them money, they gave food and shelter for it, and asked him no questions. Steve was never sure whether their apparent apathy was indifference, or stupidity, or a fine sense of personal peculiarities with which they had nothing to do.

Towards the end of August he was sitting one night on the door-step of the cottage. The wood-cutter was in a chair tilted against a big maple tree, and was smoking one of Steve's cigars—an act of politeness he very seldom committed—for he much preferred his own old pipe and black tobacco. They had nodded to each other when they met at the supper table; they had nodded again when the cigar was offered and accepted, but they had not spoken. Neither of them wished to do so. They were content to wait until they had something to say. Cynthia, the woodman's wife, was scarcely more talkative. Her vocabulary consisted of a few questions and a few exclamations. She had said to Steve when he returned from a day in the woods "Be you come home to supper?" and then put an extra plate on the table. She was now moving quietly about her cottage washing the dishes and laying the table for the early breakfast.

A great peace was all around. The sun had just set, the robins were piping the birds to bed, the woodman's colliers sleeping at Steve's feet. They always attached themselves to Steve when he visited their master, for the collier is a gentleman and knows a gentleman when he meets one. Like Steve they abhorred evil and deceit, and they meant whatever they suggested. One dog rested his head on Steve's foot; Steve's hand lay across the head of the other. The stars came out one by one, "keen glancing from the immensities," the self-same stars under which Abraham worshipped and David kept his sheep, and Columbus sailed. Arcturus pale and calm as angelic stars should be; the Pleiades with their "sweet influence," and the Belt of Orion with his "binding" one. Plants and trees and rivers and stars all spoke of incalculable beneficence to Steve and made the earth on which he trod consecrated ground. Was he lonely then? No! the loneliness of a

Was at Times Unable to Stand—Physician Advised Taking Hood's Sarsaparilla and it Cured.

"For fifteen years I was a constant sufferer with female weakness and kidney trouble. I took many different remedies but received no relief. I was unable to stand at times and I suffered great misery and spent hundreds of dollars for medicine. Finally I had an attack of bilious fever and was confined to my bed for 3 months. I was attended by a skillful physician who advised me to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, which I did and before I had finished the first bottle I began to feel better. In six weeks after I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla I was able to be about the house and I am now perfectly well and strong, and able to do a great deal of work." MRS. "Eat soul is all nonsense! It ruins relationships," Cynthia had gone to bed and was no longer the echoes of the his movements made. Steve was his companion as if he wished to. He knew what to expect in the way of conversation—half sentences like pistol shots, as if one or two of them were amiss.

"Unloach," he said, "I know that I am a queer fellow. You wonder me at nothing."

"Eat at the idle life I lead. But I think every man ought to get his happiness as possible in his own way."

"Happiness? all life means?"

"I can only live once."

"Then I don't read your Bible, Steve. It says we are only live this particular life."

"You like to live this particular life?"

"It is too full of injustice."

"I see Wilmot has lost his religion. It is a good one."

"It is bad when the client is poor."

"I think a poor man can obtain justice against a rich man?"

"The Bible says: 'with man it is not all things are possible to be done.'"

"Along pause Steve continued, "I respect of your politics? What is your?"

"I don't like that's up."

"What right?"

"It is natural to think that Providence is best."

"I am disappointed in X."

"I shouldn't have been."

"I am?"

"I am never becomes twelve."

"I am of the whole world is a politician."

"Men to him aren't fathers and mothers. They are Republicans or Democrats."

"I often wondered, Martin, if you were in these woods, and to this life?"

"It is not."

"I am calamity? And bravely, too, I am not?"

"I am a good soldier meets a shot."

"I am all a loving wife to help you?"

"I am a lad."

"I am health? Health is good fortune."

"I am salt of life."

"I am I don't fear death?"

"I am I am of death may bully the world."

"I am bully me."

"I am have a reason for that confidence."

"I know him. That was dead, and I am all living forever."

"I am Steve stretched out his hand, and I am took it, and the silence was broken. An hour passed, then I am stooped and petted the dogs, and I am with a yawn, "It is getting late, and I am you go to work so early in the morning."

"I am tomorrow. The job I was on is finished."

"I am may you will finish your last job."

"I am at it. It won't matter."

"I am think so?"

"I am not others. We are in a world of change. There's always plenty of fresh blood."

"I am true, too. Good night. I am to sleep."

"I am you it."

"I am what do you mean?"

"I am I should blood may sleep, but does it sleep?"

"I am sleep sets it free like a bird from its cage."

"I am not so."

"I am Steve did not hear this answer, for he spoke, a clear, soft, penetrating voice, into his ears and his heart. He still and his whole frame vibrated with the powerful influence. Awe, and yet meditated his duty, he bowed his head in submission to the message. It was instantly as thought, and yet it felt that a strange conviction of the necessity. He waited until the essence had departed, and then he said:

"Martin, did you hear anyone speak?"

"Not a word."

"I did. I shall not go to bed now. I am going home. My mother called me. She is needing my help in some way."

"Then go to her. Don't loiter. She may be in trouble."

"I fear she is."

"And it may be about yourself. Men shouldn't make mothers weep. God counts their tears."

In ten minutes Steve had packed the little valise he carried, and was on his way to the nearest railway station. But it was long after midnight before he was at the door of the Lloyd mansion in New York. He had debated with himself on the journey, as to whether he would call there, or go at once to Newport, but had concluded that it might be best to see if his father was not in New York. If so, Steve was sure anything unusual would have been telegraphed to him. He was a little astonished to see lights in the house; more so when he rang the bell and it was promptly answered, and the sight of the servant whom he knew had gone with the family to Newport sent a quick terror to his heart.

"You here, Kelly?" he ejaculated, and the man answered, "Mr. Lloyd is very ill, sir. The family are all in New York."

The man preceded him into the parlor, turned up the lights and then went to notify the mother and sister of Steve's arrival. He was too restless to sit, too sensitive to the atmosphere around him to doubt what presence was waiting there. But full of anxiety as he was he resented this gloomy anticipation of the change which affected the whole house.

"I wonder what we are Christians for?" he mentally exclaimed. "We never see anything but terror in the visit of death. The pagan Athenian, caressing his dog, ere he cheerfully went out and 'fared to the house of the Lord of Many Guests,' might teach us a lesson. There is no fear of the terrible in his face or attitude. He knows that all good things await the new comer to Hades, and that 'Happiness is betrothed to him in a garden of myrtles.' Then why should not a Christian American take leave of his life and his friends in the same cheerful hopeful spirit?"

He had not finished this strain of thought when Mrs. Lloyd and Alice came into the room together. He was shocked at the change in their appearance, and when he heard something of the great burden they were bearing he felt a burning shame and anger at his own careless neglect. "I ought to have known that father was not fit to leave," he said, "and I did know it, but in my selfish carelessness I hoped things would go on as usual until I had had my holiday."

"You ought at least to have left us some idea of where to find you, Steve, in case of serious trouble. I thought my heart would break to-night, with the very longing for the comfort and help you could be. If prayer could have reached your ear, as well as the ear of God, you would, you must, have heard my cry."

"I did hear it, and I answered it at once. I will not leave you again, mother."

"Your father's sickness may be tedious, or it may end suddenly—and there is Jessie."

"Jessie is very happy. I have not the slightest doubt of that."

SAPOLIO

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

The Peacemaker's Blessing.

ONE of the sweetest of "the blessings" in the Sermon on the Mount, is the one which declares, "Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God." There is living over in Ohio, a minister of the Gospel of peace, whose whole life has been one long work of peacemaking. Not only is gathered many striking incidents of his noble and useful life.

But turning away from many more striking stories in some ways, I have found this picture of the peacemaker to be very charming in my own eyes.

There was a local preacher and a class leader who had disagreed about some trivial matter. For years they did not fellowship each other. Their friends became involved in their quarrel, and the entire circuit suffered in consequence. Several efforts had been made to settle the difficulty, but in vain. Dr. Fee saw that nothing could so insure the success of their revival efforts at the annual camp-meeting on which they were entering, as the making of peace between these brethren. So getting them together on the camp-ground, he said: "Let us go to the woods."

When they reached a secluded place, he asked them to kneel with him in prayer, and he prayed earnestly that this difficulty might be settled and they again become friends. He told them of the injury which was being done by this unfortunate affair, and the fearful responsibility which was upon them. He said to the local preacher: "Brother W., will you state this case just as you understand it, as fairly as possible?"

He did so in a very candid manner. Addressing his opponent, Dr. Fee said: "Brother P., will you state your case fairly, just as you understand it, with your matters of grievance, whatever they may be?"

He, with equal fairness, presented his case.

"Now," said Dr. Fee, pleasantly, "I ask each of you one question, Brother W., do you believe Brother P. to be an honest, truthful man, and that he would not willfully tell a falsehood?"

He said, "I do."
"Brother P., do you believe that Brother W. is an honest man and that he would not tell, willfully, a known falsehood?"

Said he, "I believe he would not."
Then said Dr. Fee, "Brother W., you have stated your grievances; Brother P. has stated his. You have agreed to regard each other as honest and truthful men. If this be true, is there anything between you which ought to keep you apart, and which will justify you in involving almost an entire church in a personal difficulty?"

They both said with some hesitancy, "there is not."

"Are you mutually willing before God, to settle this difficulty here and now to the best of your ability?"

Each of them replied, "We are."
Dr. Fee said, "Let us pray."

They knelt down where they were, on the leaves which covered the earth. The Doctor prayed, and then asked Brother W. to pray. After clearing his throat a good while, he began. His prayer was not very fervent. Then he called on Brother P., and he had but little spirit of prayer. But this persistent peacemaker did not give up, but after praying again himself, called on each of them, one after the other, to pray again. They did so and were melted into tears. They arose.

"Now," said the Doctor, "Brethren, suppose you shake hands with each other and bury this difficulty forever."

Brother W., extended his hand to Brother P., who received it, but each of them looked away from the other. Said the Doctor: "That will never do! Look each other in the face, and, with a 'God bless you,' give each other a hearty shake."

They did so, and in a little while their arms were around each other and they were wonderfully blessed. When they returned to the camp-ground, there was great rejoicing among the people. This reconciliation was the beginning of a glorious revival.

between sinful souls and their God, but between man and his fellow.

It would perhaps be no exaggeration to say that the most successful pastor in winning souls for the past fifty years, in the Ohio River Valley, is the Rev. Dr. William I. Fee, whose name is full of fragrance throughout large parts of Kentucky, West Virginia, and Ohio. For considerably over half a century he has been constantly preaching the Gospel and God has given him wonderful revivals every year. He has been one of the most modest and retiring of men through it all, but has at last been persuaded to publish a volume, entitled: "Bringing the Sheaves," in which

and Pattern to Cut It By,

Express Prepaid, for $2.00

A large mill owner having manufactured an immense quantity of Silk Stripe Zephyrs, in preparation for this season's demand, found himself with a larger stock of goods on hand than he could sell through the regular channels of trade.

I approached him with an offer for the entire lot a few days ago, and to my surprise he accepted it. It is therefore possible for me to offer a dress pattern of this elegant material, express paid, with a pattern and full directions for making, for the astonishingly low price of $2.

The patterns are those sold by several of the largest retail dry goods stores in the land. Your knowledge of patterns will show you that the standard patterns which are sold the country over would cost you for a suit anywhere from 50 cents to $1. It is therefore a very easy matter to see that at the price I offer the buyer is getting what would ordinarily cost $4 or $4.50 for $2.

This offer must be accepted within thirty days, as I must turn the entire lot of goods into cash before the 1st of June.

In order to facilitate your choice of patterns, I will be glad to send samples of goods and pictures of paper patterns for your inspection and selection for 10 cents in stamps. If you purchase from these samples, the 10 cents paid will be credited on the purchase, and you need send but $1.50 in ordering.

The fact that our advertisement is received by this publication is a guarantee that I will do as I agree to do herein, but references will be sent with samples; so act promptly and send for samples at once.

For 22 years I suffered untold agonies from Fetid Catarrh. Aerial Medication cured me in 1889, and I am still entirely free from the disease. Mrs. I. F. Sharp, Twinville, Tenn.

25 years I was almost totally deaf; could not understand a word; had to carry a slate so that people could "talk" to me. In one week after commencing Aerial Medication, I surprised my friends by discarding the slate, I steadily improved, and now can hear the slightest noise and can understand conversation perfectly. ARMENIAN AID.

The General Condition Slowly Improving—
Progress of the Orphan Work.

In a letter from one of the missionaries of the American Board in Armenia, just received, encouraging reference is made of the progress of the rescue work among the orphans of Oorfa, which the readers of this journal have substantially aided during the past winter. The writer says:

THE SAME APPLICANT AS HE DEPARTED.

"He found the work at Oorfa well organized and in a prosperous condition. How to provide for the very large number of widows and orphans there, has been one of the difficult elements in the problem of that city.

"As showing what the ruin wrought in this part of our field has been the following fact is very significant: At the recent election of municipal officers at Adiaman, a part of whom are required to be Christians, in making the usual nominations a list of Christians eligible to office in previous years was produced containing some fifty names, and of these only one, and he a Syrian, was found to be alive.

"At Biridjik out of a Christian population of 1,500, some 140 were killed and all Christian houses were looted. The lives of those who remained were spared only as they professed Islam. Since then, however, they have nearly all returned to their old faith; but such has been the poverty and fear to which they have been subjected, that now barely 600 Christians remain in the city."

Meanwhile relief and rescue work goes on at many points in Anatolia. At Cesarea, Sivas, Aintab and elsewhere the orphanages are full and the work is very promising. Misery and destitution are gradually disappearing and should there be no renewal of the troubles, the conditions might be expected to steadily improve. As illustrating the work of the Clothing Bureau of the Relief Department at the Mission at Cesarea, photographs are given of an applicant as he arrived and as he departed. There are hundreds in a similar condition. The following contributions to the Fund have been received during the week:

Children's Day Music.

A service for Children's Day usually second Sunday in June, entitled "The Mission of the Flowers," came to us from the Biglow & Main Co., 76 East North Street. The music is by Hubert P Main, whose previous services for Children's Day have been deservedly popular. There are a few dialogues and recitations bearing on the significance of the day and the mission which the flowers have to fulfill. The whole is a well-connected service, admirable for use on the occasion, and the music is in Mr. Main's happiest style. Price five cents. $4 per 100, by express.

THE LITTLE CRIPPLE.

DAILY by an upper window—
Knowing little earthly joy—
Gazing on the passing travelers,
Sat a little cripple boy.
Of his lonely heart was yearning
For the pleasures others knew,
But his pleasures were like visits
From the angels—very few.
Though in poverty and suffering,
Patiently his lot he bore,
For he knew the love of Jesus,
And a smile of gladness wore.
Earnestly he watched the passers—
Some light-hearted—some more grave—
And he often longed to tell them
Of God's wondrous power to save.
With a heart brim full of music—
How he longed by some sweet song,
There to tell his precious message
To the careless, hurried throng,
But he dared not sing a sonnet.
For he knew his song would be
One with pain, and sorrow laden,
With no hint of melody.

So he wrote his little message
On a fair and spotless scroll,
Hoping that God's blessed angels
Would convey it to some soul.
Very simple was the message,
And he dropped it to the ground—
Watched it floating—praying, wond'ring
By whom first it should be found.

Soon a traveler espied it—
By the angels surely led,
And he caught that bit of whiteness,
And unfolding it, he read:
"I must do for God, my Father,
What he sent me here to do,
And this message, from my window
Has been sent, my friend, to you.

"You have tried the world around you
But no pleasure have you seen;
Naught but bitter disappointment.
Try John's Gospel, 'three, sixteen.'
'Whosoever—Everlasting'— Message full of grace divine.
'Tis for you, dear friend, forever,
If the Saviour shall be thine."

In that heart it found a lodgment, Touched a chord which long had been,
Silently entombed, forgotten—
'Neath the wretchedness of sin.
New ambitions were awakened.
Sin and sorrow took their flight,
And in place of earthly darkness
There arose a heavenly light.

He was only just a cripple,
Sitting by the window pane;
Yet his life of patient sorrow
Was not given all in vain.
It was but a piece of paper
That was floated from above,
But it bore a precious message
Of a Saviour's dying love.

Strange New Shrub that Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc. Free.

We have previously described the new botanic discovery, Alkavis, which proves a specific cure for diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disorder of the kidneys or urinary organs. It is now stated that Alkavis is a product of the well known Kava-Kava Shrub, and is a specific cure for these diseases just as quinine is for malaria. Hon. R. C. Wood, of Lowell, Ind., writes that in four weeks Alkavis cured him of kidney and bladder disease of ten year's standing, and Rev. Thomas M. Owen, of West Pawlet, Vt., gives similar testimony. Many ladies also testify to its wonderful curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. The only importers of Alkavis so far are the Church Kidney Cure Co., of 414 Fourth Avenue, New York, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative power.

Dear Sirs:—Through a friend who then had one of your Patent Elastic Felt Mattresses in use, I was first introduced to them. That was in 1881 (16 years ago). I ordered one as an experiment, and I take great pleasure in saying that the results have been in every way satisfactory. Since that time I have procured others from you, until now they are the only kind we have in our house. They retain their shape and elasticity in a manner that makes devotees of Hair mattresses incredulous. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

I. de P., Grand Rapids, P. I., Boynton, Kingfisher, and others. See article on Grant Monument on page 398 which contains explanation.

Angie F., Morristown, N. J., Dr. Talmage and Dr. Klopsch have been in the West for some time past, receiving pledges of corn for India.

Constant Reader, Gloucester, Mass. Is it right to turn a member out of the Church for living in sin? If a man, for instance, falls into the drink habit, should he be expelled? In Matt. 13: 30, the direction to let both grow together till the harvest seems to forbid exclusion.

The passage does not apply to the Church, but to the world, and the direction is given to angels, not to men. If there is no repentance, no effort after amendment, the Church has no alternative. She must exclude the wrongdoer. Every case must be judged on its merits, especially in the matter of drink. A man may be waging a very brave struggle to overcome his propensity and may deserve all the sympathy and help the Church can give him, while to cast him out might cause him to lose heart and despair. The Church cannot afford to tolerate sin in its members. It is bound to show its condemnation and abhorrence of sin, but it should deal tenderly with the sinner and should encourage him to repent and quit sin. The severity sometimes exercised causes the sinner to persevere in his sin, while by kindness and affectionate exhortation the man might be restored. If you read the first and second epistles to the Corinthians you will see how a very flagrant case was dealt with under Paul's direction. From 11. Cor. 2: 7, we infer that the discipline was beneficial to the offender.

Earnest Inquirer, Denver, Colo. 1. Don't you think a sincere Christian can be in such a physical condition—a nervous dyspeptic for instance—that happiness is an impossibility? 2. What is your opinion of phrenology and palmistry?

1. Unquestionably many very good Christians are great sufferers physically; yet we know of instances where the spiritual nature is so highly developed and the faith so beautiful that all physical infirmities are overcome. This shows that happiness even in such cases, is not impossible. 2. They are pseudo-sciences and not acknowledged by any of the scientific schools.

Rev. J. J. Wilkinson, a missionary of the American Sunday School Union at Beebe, White County, Ark., writes:

The cries of the distressed and suffering ones in the flooded districts are daily coming to us, such as have not been heard in this country before. Relief is badly needed in Crittendon, St. Francis, Lee, Monroe, and other counties where I have labored as Sunday School missionary in eastern Arkansas. Whole counties are almost covered with water and hundreds of families are destitute of home or food. In Monroe, St. Francis, and Lee counties I planted a number of Sunday Schools three years ago; now in Monroe alone, one hundred families are reported in a starving and homeless condition, the water covers over twenty-five thousand acres of land there.

Fortunately, help has already reached a majority of the worst cases of suffering in the flooded districts. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's relief expedition (which was accompanied by a missionary of the American Sunday School Union and rendered aid to several thousand persons), notifies us that the Government's relief agents are now at work and that the suffering is steadily decreasing.

Mrs. M. B. W., E. Corinth, Me. 1. Are ostrich feathers shed naturally or plucked forcibly with the quills stained with blood, as I have read; also ostrich feathers, augettes, etc.? 2. Would it not be better for ladies to wear artificial feathers than to aid an industry furnishing employment to many people?

1. We understand that almost all the feathers used as plumes are plucked from the living bird. Using "shed" feathers is the exception. 2. It certainly would.

F. M. B., Grand Rapids, Mich. 1. Did Christ's sufferings consist in his taking on him the human form and living a life of humiliation, or was it that he took on him the nature of man? 2. How can I feel that I am a Christian if I do not feel that in him I can find a God who can be reconciled with me? 3. What is the meaning of the words in 1 Cor. 15: 20, "that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God?"

1. It depends on what you mean by sacrifice. If you refer to the Levitical types, it took place on Calvary. But if you use the word in its ordinary meaning of surrendering, or giving something for the sake of others, it comprehends the whole life. Christ must have suffered much in living among men. There must have been so much of his association with them that was shocking to his pure nature. We may imagine that he left a refined home to live among "untamed savages," by the change from Court must have been a fairly great one. Then his friend, murderer stood him and hurt his feelings by their coarse thoughts and words. This was life-long, and must have tried him as severely as his physical sufferings. His humiliation in that sense was a sacrifice for humanity. 2. There is no need to reconcile them, as they are not in opposition. The prevalent notion was that being a son of Abraham gave a man a right of entrance to the kingdom of God, and that certain rites and ceremonies might give a title, but Paul emphasizes Christ's teaching to Nicodemus (John 3: 1-20), that an inward and spiritual change is necessary. Flesh and blood have nothing to do with it. Job, on the other hand, is proclaiming his confidence that death will not end all, and that though it may destroy his body, yet it will not keep him from seeing God. The rendering of the margin of the Revised Version makes this clear. It is, "Without my flesh shall I see God."

money only being required of him for groceries, dry goods, doctor's bills, etc., while the minister must pay cash for every article consumed or used in his family, and often—usually in the poorer communities—even for the rent of the house he lives in. Should the farmer choose to donate the minister anything, church rules require, I believe, that the full value thereof shall be credited to his salary, which puts a different light on the matter, but which farmers seldom think of.

Sarah C., Rochester, N. Y. Is it customary to offer a minister a fee—or for him to accept one—for officiating at the funeral of a member of his own church?

It is customary and proper. There is no rule on the subject, however, and pastors frequently officiate at funerals where the poverty is such that a fee is out of the question.

S. A. McK., Unity, Ore. I note the question of E. C. R., New Oxford, Pa., and your answer. I wish to refer you to several places in the Bible showing divine warrant for the use of instrumental music in the worship of God. 1. Chron. 15: 16 and 28, read the chapter and also note 22, 24, 27 verses. 1. Chron. 16: 4, to 27 note also chapter 17: 2, "God is with them." If so would not God have forbidden the use of instruments, that is, if he objected. Note also the diversion for service as given in chapter 23: 5. Also chapter 25: 1, 3, 5, 6, 7. It seems they had regular instruction in song and instrumental music. Read David's address to the people, 1. Chron. 25: 1 to 10, and decide whether David did "right in the sight of God" during the later years of life. Read also 11. Chron. 5: 1, that instruments were also dedicated and put among the treasures. Read the beautiful description in same chapter 5: 12 to 14. Read Ezra chapter 3: 8 to end of chapter. They played on instruments and sang and shouted and praised the Lord. There is also an account of a grand concert in the book of Nehemiah, but I will let your readers find it for themselves, only referring to chapter 12: 30. Also read Isaiah 38: 20. There are other places where instruments were used in the praise services (and there are harps in heaven), and never a word of condemnation from the Lord. What God does not forbid or condemn is surely not sinful.

Samuel F., Lake Geneva, Wis. I should like to enquire is it right for me as a Christian, to give financial support to the Church, when I am convinced it would do more good to use it in reclaiming drunkards and preventing the young from becoming drunkards?

We consider that the Church, with its wide-reaching ramifications and great experience, is best able to judge which branch of Christian work is most urgent and deserving, and it is, therefore, entitled to your first consideration. This need not debar you, however, from making an effort in any other direction as your own heart may direct. Relief Tug's Journey on the Wide-spreading Waters of the Flooded Mississippi—Interesting Incidents of the Work—Sufferers among the Chutes and Islands.

THE work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief expedition to the flooded districts of the Mississippi Valley, under the charge of Mr. George A. Seaman has been prosecuted with energy, and hundreds of families have good cause to bless the visit of that timely messenger of mercy, the relief tugboat, Welcome.

A large appropriation contributed by the United States Government is now in the hands of distribution, but many helpless destitute families have been relieved of immediate starvation and suffering by the Seaman and his co-workers, who have not yet been reached by the Government relief for many days, and perhaps during which time privation and suffering might have rendered the succor given quickly is doubly efficient. Much cannot be said of the able organization of the American Sunday Union Missionary, Mr. W. W. Seaman, who was ever present and ready to cheer the hearts of hope and comfort to cheer the sufferers. It is in times of distress and calamity that the human heart is in an especially receptive mood, and while material aid is given, the missionary improved the opportunity of directing the minds of the needy to the Great Helper, who is ready for all who put their trust

the Welcome, and fully comprehend the situation the character and habits of the people must be taken into consideration. The population may be divided into four classes: The thrifty whites, the intelligent negroes, the poor whites and the ignorant negroes. The first two classes are for the greater part in a position to care for themselves, and often to aid their unfortunate neighbors as well. Of the third class some are fairly well provisioned, but the majority are in need of assistance, especially those living in the regions remote from the towns and villages. The ignorant negroes are, however, in the greatest need. As a class they are improvident, taking no heed of the morrow, and the flood has found them, for the most part, without provisions, their houses destroyed or temporarily submerged, and utter destitution and starvation exists among them. It has been the aim of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD expedition to relieve all cases of want that came to its notice without regard to color or creed. No deserving applicant was refused, and a diligent search was prosecuted to discover the remote cases.

ocean of silver. In and out among the little islets, the Welcome went seeking those cases of distress that were least likely to be encountered by the Government relief boats soon to follow. At Avenue, Ark., one point where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief boat tied up to a tree over night, the total width of the river was estimated at not less than sixty miles—an inland sea, with nothing in sight save here and there a clump of tree tops, or a half-submerged frame dwelling.

"God is surely smiling on this work," was the pious ejaculation of the captain of the Welcome, when he saw the bright sunshine following many days of incessant rain and high winds. And assuredly no fairer weather could have been wished.

found several families who had not been reached by other relief. From its stores they were bountifully supplied. Having saved but a few articles of cheap furniture and two mules when the rising flood engulfed them, they gratefully received the much-welcomed food left them by the relief boat.

Near Laconia the wealthy planters have built a private levee inside of the river levee. It encloses about twenty thousand acres of fertile farming land. Crevasses broke in both levees and the land lays under eight feet of water. Inside of this levee nearly all are well provided for, but outside of it sickness and destitution exists. Dr. S. D. Tonge, who visits his patients in a fleet little skiff, volunteered to distribute food and delicacies to the sick and aged in his locality.

At Ferguson Landing, a boat-load of provisions was left with Ed. Williams, who has charge of the local relief supplies at that point, to be distributed among eighteen or twenty families living in a temporary camp, about a mile back on the levee.

At island 62, island 63, island 66 and Montezuma Tow-head a week's provisions was left for about ten families.

There is still much destitution and suffering to be relieved. The subsiding of Brown, whose long experience as a navigator of these waters enabled the relief boat to reach many points in the valley to which a less skillful sailor would have been unable to guide the craft. Thus the Welcome was brought to the most isolated and needy homes—where the coming of the Welcome was indeed providential and a benediction to the homeless and suffering.

It is difficult for one not familiar with the lower Mississippi Valley and the horrors therein to fully realize the extent of the distress and destitution which the flood has brought to this region. To

The Welcome's skiff threaded its way through forests, over fields and in and out of intricate passages, everywhere bringing joy and sunshine to the refugees. It has been an errand of love and mercy, if possible as great a pleasure to those who acted as distributors of the relief as to those that received it. It is indeed a great privilege to be permitted to bear the tokens of God's goodness and mercy to suffering humanity and to spread the Gospel among the people.

On the whole, the journey down the river was a pleasant one. A bright sun made the surface of the flood shine like an

THE BREAD QUESTION.

A Sermon by Rev T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, 1. Kings 17: 6, And the ravens brought him bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening.

HE ornithology of the Bible is a very interesting study. The stork which knoweth her appointed time. The common sparrows teaching the lesson of God's providence. The ostriches of the desert, by careless incubation, illustrating the recklessness of parents who do not take enough pains with their children. The eagle symbolizing riches which take wings and fly away. The pelican emblemizing solitude. The bat, a flake of the darkness. The night hawk, the ossifrage, the cuckoo, the lapwing, the osprey, by the command of God in Leviticus, flung out of the world's bill of fare.

I would like to have been with Audubon as he went through the woods, with gun and pencil, bringing down and sketching the fowls of heaven, his unfolded portfolio thrilling all Christendom. What wonderful creatures of God the birds are! Some of them, this morning, like the songs of heaven let loose, bursting through the gates of heaven. Consider their feathers, which are clothing and conveyance at the same time: the nine vertebrae of the neck, the three eyelids to each eye, the third eyelid an extra curtain for graduating the light of the sun. Some of these birds scavengers and some of them orchestra. Consider those of them that wear their golden crowns and crests, showing them to be feathered imperials. And listen to the humming-bird's serenade in the ear of the honeysuckle. Look at the belted kingfisher, striking like a dart from sky to water. Listen to the voice of the owl, giving the key-note to all croakers. And behold the condor among the Andes, battling with the reindeer. I do not know whether an aquarium or aviary is the best altar from which to worship God.

There is an incident in my text that baffles all the ornithological wonders of the world. The grain crop had been cut off. Famine was in the land. In a cave by the brook Cherith sat a minister of God, Elijah, waiting for something to eat. Why did he not go to the neighbors? There were no neighbors; it was a wilderness. Why did he not pick some of the berries? There were none. If there had been, they would have been dried up. Seated one morning at the mouth of his cave, the prophet sees a flock of birds approaching. The length of their wings, the blackness of their color, their loud, harsh "cruck! cruck!" prove them to be ravens.

They whirl around about the prophet's head, and then they come on fluttering wing and pause on the level of his lips, and one of the ravens brings bread, and another raven brings meat, and after they have discharged their tiny cargo they wheel past, and others come, until after awhile the prophet has enough, and these black servants of the wilderness table are gone. For six months, and some say a whole year, morning and evening, a breakfast and a supper-bell sounded as these ravens rang out on the air their "cruck! cruck!" Guess where they got the food from. The old rabbins say they got it from the kitchen of King Ahab. Others say that the ravens got their food from pious Obadiah, who was in the habit of feeding the persecuted. Some say that the ravens brought the food to their young in the trees, and that Elijah had only to climb up and get it. Some say that the whole story is inrolled; for these were carnivorous birds, and the food they carried was the torn flesh of living beasts, and therefore ceremonially unclean; or it was carrion, and would not have been fit for the prophet. Some say they were not ravens at all, but that the word translated

"ravens" in my text ought to have been translated "Arabs;" so it would have read: "The Arabs brought bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening." Anything but admit the Bible to be true.

While, then, we watch the ravens feeding Elijah, let the swift dove of God's Spirit sweep down the sky with divine food, and on outspread wing pause at the lip of every soul hungering for comfort.

On the banks of what rivers have been the great battles of the world? While you are looking over the map of the world to answer that, I will tell you that the great conflict to-day is on the Potomac, on the Hudson, on the Mississippi, on the Thames, on the Savannah, on the Rhine, on the Nile, on the Ganges, on the Hoang-Ho. It is a battle that has been going on for six thousand years. The troops engaged in it are sixteen hundred millions, and those who have fallen by the way are vaster in number than those who march. It is a battle for bread.

Sentimentalists sit in a cushioned chair, in their pictured study, with their slipped feet on a damask ottoman, and say that this world is a great scene of avarice and greed. It does not seem so to me. If it were not for the absolute necessities of the cases, nine-tenths of the stores, factories, shops, banking-houses of the land would be closed to-morrow. Who is that man delving in the Colorado Hills? or toiling in a New England factory? or going through a roll of bills in the bank? or measuring a fabric on the counter? He is a champion sent forth in behalf of some home-circle that has to be cared for, in behalf of some Church of God that has to be supported, in behalf of some asylum of mercy that has to be sustained. Who is that woman bending over the sewing-machine, or carrying the bundle, or sweeping the room, or mending the garment, or sweltering at the washtub? That is Deborah, one of the Lord's heroines, battling against Amalekithian want, which comes down with iron chariot to crush her and hers. The great question with the vast majority of people to-day is not "Home Rule," but whether there shall be any home to rule; not one of tariff, but whether there shall be anything to tax. The great question with the vast majority of people is, "How shall I support my family? How shall I meet my notes? How shall I pay my rent? How shall I give food, clothing, and education to those who are dependent upon me?" Oh, if God would help me to-day to assist you in the solution of that problem the happiest man in this house would be your preacher! I have gone out on a cold morning with expert sportsmen to hunt for pigeons; I have gone out on the meadows to hunt for quail; I have gone out on the marsh to hunt for reed-birds; but to-day I am out for ravens.

Notice, in the first place in the story of my text, that these winged caterers came to Elijah direct from God.

"I have commanded the ravens that they feed thee," we find God saying in an adjoining passage. They did not come out of some other cave. They did not just happen to alight there. God freighted them. God launched them, and God told them by what cave to swoop. That is the same God that is going to supply you.

Notice again in this story of the text, that the ravens did not allow Elijah to hoard up a surplus. They did not bring enough on Monday to last all the week. They did not bring enough one morning to last until the next morning. They came twice a day, and brought just enough for one time. You know as well as I that the great fret of the world is that we want a surplus; we want the ravens to bring enough for fifty years. You have more confidence in the Washington banks or Bank of England than you have in the Royal Bank of Heaven. You say, "All that is very poetic, but you may have the black ravens; give me the gold eagles." We had better be content with just enough.

God is infinite in resource. When the city of Rochelle was besieged and the inhabitants were dying of the famine, the tides washed up on the beach as never before, and as never since, enough shellfish to feed the whole city. God is good. There is no mistake about that. History tells us that in 1555 in England there was a great drought. The crops failed; but in Essex, on the rocks, in a place where they had neither sown nor cultured, a great crop of peas grew until they filled a hundred measures; and there were blossoming vines enough, promising as much more.

But why go so far? I can give you a family incident. Some generations back there was a great drought in Connecticut, New England. The water disappeared from the hills, and the farmers living on the hills drove their cattle down toward the valleys, and had them supplied at the wells and fountains of the neighbors. But these after a while began to fail, and the neighbors said to Mr. Birdseye, of whom I shall speak, "You must not send your flocks and herds down here any more; our wells are giving out." Mr. Birdseye, the old Christian man, gathered his family at the altar, and with his family he gathered the slaves of the household—for bondage was then in vogue in Connecticut—and on their knees before God they cried for water; and the family story is, that there was weeping and great sobbing at that altar that the family might not perish for lack of water, and that the herds and flocks might not perish.

The family rose from the altar. Mr. Birdseye, the old man, took his staff and walked out over the hills, and in a place where he had been scores of times, without noticing anything particular, he saw the ground was very dark, and he took his staff and turned up the ground, and water started; and he beckoned to his servants, and they came and brought pails and buckets until all the family and all the flocks and the herds were cared for; and then they made troughs reaching from that place down to the house and barn, and the water flowed, and it is a living fountain to-day.

Now I call that old grandfather, Elijah, and I call that brook that began to roll then, and is rolling still, the brook Cherith; and the lesson to me and to all who hear it is, when you are in great stress of circumstances, pray and dig, dig and pray, and pray and dig. How does that passage go? "The mountains shall depart and the hills be removed, but my loving-kindness shall not fail." If your merchandise, if your mechanism, if your husbandry, fail, look out for ravens. If you have in your despondency put God on trial and condemned Him as guilty of cruelty, I move to-day for a new trial. If the biography of your life is ever written, I will tell you what the first chapter, and the middle chapter, and the last chapter will be about, if it is written accurately. The first chapter about mercy, the middle chapter about mercy, the last chapter about mercy. The mercy that hovered over your cradle. The mercy that will hover over your grave. The mercy that will cover all between.

Again, this story of the text impresses me that relief came to this prophet with the most unexpected and with seemingly impossible conveyance. If it had been a robin-redbreast, or a musical meadow lark, or a meek turtle-dove, or a sublime albatross that had brought the food to Elijah, it would not have been so surprising. But, no. It was a bird so fierce and inauspicious that we have fashioned one of our most forceful and repulsive words out of it—ravenous. That bird has a passion for picking out the eyes of men and of animals. It loves to maul the sick and the dying. It swallows with vulturous guggle everything it can put its beak on; and yet all the food Elijah gets for six months or a year is from ravens. So your supply is going to come from an unexpected source.

You think some great-hearted, generous man will come along and give you his name on the back of your note, or he will go security for you in some great enterprise. No, he will not. God will open the heart of some Shylock toward you. Your relief will come from the most unexpected quarter. The Providence seemed ominous will be to you more than that which seemed auspicious. It will be a chaffinch with breast and wing of white and brown and chestnut and will be a black raven.

Here is where we all make our mistake, and that is in regard to the color of providence. A white providence comes to us, and we say, "Oh, it is mercy. Then a black providence comes to us, and we say, 'Oh, that is disaster.' The white providence comes to you, you have great business success, you have a hundred thousand dollars, you get proud, and you get independent of God, and you begin to feel that the 'Give me this day my daily bread' is appropriate for you, for you have provision for a hundred years. Then a black providence comes, and it takes everything away, and then you begin to pray, and you begin to feel your dependence, and begin to be humble before God, and you cry out for treasures in heaven. The black providence brought you ruin. The white providence brought you ruin. That which seemed to be mercy, and dissonant was your estimate. It was a raven. There is a child born in your house. That little child stood with its two feet in the very arms of your affection, and with its hands it took hold of the altar of soul. But one day there came one of those scourges of children—scarlet fever, or croup, or diphtheria—and a bright scene vanished. The charming strange questions, the pulling dresses as you crossed the floor—ceased.

As the great Friend of children came down and leaned toward that cradle, and took the little one in his arms, and away with it into the bower of summer, your eye began to follow, and you followed the treasure he carried, and you have been following the shadow; and instead of thinking of it only once a week, as formerly, you think of it all the time, and you more pure and tender-hearted than you used to be, and you are patient waiting for the daybreak. It is a righteousness in you to acknowledge that you are a better man than you used to be, you are a better woman than you used to be. What was it that brought you sanctifying blessing? Oh, it was the shadow on the nursery; it was the shadow on the short grave; it was the dark shadow on your broken heart; it was the brooding of a great black trouble; it was a raven—it was a raven! Do not teach this people that white providences do not always mean advancement; that black providences do not mean retrogression.

My friend, you have a right to go from precedent that God is going to care of you. Has he not done it three times every day? That is marvelous. I look back and wonder that God has given me food three times regular all my lifetime, never missing once, and then I was lost in the clouds; but that very morning and the night I met the ravens.

Oh, the Lord is so good that I wish his people would trust him with their lives—the life you are now living at which every tick of the watch and stroke of the clock inform you is approaching. Bread for your immortal soul to-day. To all the sinning, a sorrowing, and the tempted, delicacies comes this hour. Look down, and see nothing but your spiritual defeat. Look back, and you see nothing but wasted opportunity. Cast your eyes forward, and you have a fearful look of judgment and fiery indignation which devour the adversary. But look up, you behold the whipped shoulders of interceding Christ, and the face of a doing God, and the irradiation opening heaven. I hear the whirl of wings. Do you not feel the rush of air on your cheek? Ravens! Ravens!

There is only one question I want to ask. How many of this audience are going to trust God for the supply of their needs and trust the Lord Jesus Christ for the redemption of their immortal souls? How many of the hoofs and the wheels of the judgment-chariot will be demonstrated

IN THE KINGDOM OF THE SHAH.

Hannah G. Yoseph Writes of Her Travels in Persia—Some Interesting Phases of Oriental Social Life.

IN NOVEMBER of last year, Mrs. Hannah G. Yoseph, a talented Oriental medical missionary worker, who had just completed a course of study in this country, sailed from the port of New York for her native land, Persia. Previous to her departure, Mrs. Yoseph entered into an arrangement with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, under whose auspices she will do her medical missionary work in Persia for a time, visiting the outlying provinces of the Shah's empire, healing the sick and telling the story of Jesus and his life to the Persians in their peasant homes. Her first letter appears below:

"URMI, PERSIA, Feb. 7, 1897.
After a journey of forty days by land from America, we reached Urmia. Our friends and relatives were glad to see us arrive at such a season of the year. The last few days of our journey were exceedingly cold, the thermometer dropping from ten to fifteen degrees below zero.
In these years, a great many changes have taken place. We find that the Christians are more patriotic and stand by each other better. We find the Mohammedans more fanatical than ever. They display the same spiritless zeal that characterized the Caliphates, but they are wiser and more respectful, though no more merciful to their enemies than before.
Drinking, we found, has become an established habit with the poor as well as the rich. While in a manzil (stopping place) on one occasion, some Mohammedan man thought that I had too many buttons on my cloak and while I was relieving me of all of them. At 5 o'clock when our caravan was ready to start, we found my cloak buttonless. I held a Nestorian about to take me, with multitudes of hands, told the people; the owner of the cloak, an American lady; the priest must be found immediately; if not, we will march to Teheran (the capital) to the Consul, and the village will be destroyed. At first they were by all the prophets, the Engil (New Testament) and the Koran, 'we have not taken them.' We waited, and then the woman said 'Wallah big go-mish-hikh' (By Allah, we have not taken it.) She added: 'We will look under the water jars and table; probably a cat has cut them off.' After a little while, all were brought forth, and every button showed where it had been cut with a knife. We were begged not to make any complaint, and to forgive them, because the thief was a little girl of four or five years, but she was married and had already divorced her husband.

"Travelling in Persia is expensive and arduous. One must take bed and bedding, food and utensils for cooking it, and during summer a tent is very convenient. Sometimes Mohammedans take a notion and will not sell anything to Christians. In one of the manzils we were refused even water. All earthen vessels that a Christian touches are immediately broken and vessels of gold, silver and brass are cleansed by repeating the salawat (part of the creed) when they are washed.

"In Persia, the words 'home,' 'house,' 'woman,' or 'wife,' are almost synonyms. Every girl in Persia is expected to get married and to make a home. She is the life of the home and the producer of everything. She is loved according to the number of her children, especially if they be sons. She makes her husband's clothes and cooks his food. She must obey him implicitly and have no will of her own. She must also obey his mother, whose jealous exactions often make their lives unhappy and sad. It is considered honorable to have two and three generations living together, grandparents and their children and their children's children. As a result, there are hundreds of homes where quarrel and disputation are daily occurrences. Among the Mohammedans it is a great sin, not to marry, and all their women, be they invalids, blind, or crippled, must die under Cabin (marriage certificate). A neighbor of ours—a woman of seventy—is married to a boy of day-old baby girl before the very eyes of her mother and nurse. The same hands that performed the satanic act were folded upon his own breast in death three days later.

"A woman takes part in all the religious rites. She weaves and labors with her husband in the month of Moharrum (memorial of the assassination of Hasan and Haasen); she fasts and prays in Ramazan; she gives alms to the poor and shelter to the weary and to the stranger; she travels their backs, and standing in the sunshine. There were young girls sitting on pieces of carpet and embroidering Persian skull-caps, and men with wooden forks were stirring rice that had been spread on the roof to dry. There were 'brides' of two or three months, wearing their beautiful red costumes, their faces covered with red silk or cloth. Red predominates in a Persian bride's trousseau.

"When the villagers saw us from the roofs they cried: 'Shalamalokhoon' ('peace be to you.') and we responded 'hawetoon basemy' ('we wish you well'). Just at the gate we were met by Sonna, the daughter of the house.

"Sogooltu pshena, titawate' ('in peace you have come, dear friends'). 'Come in and warm yourselves.'

"There was the mother sitting at her machine and spinning cotton. She rose to receive us and kissed us on both cheeks (as is the custom of the country), and said to her daughter:

"Sonna, bring some grapes for Khanna (my name). She has been in America so long and has not eaten such nice grapes.'

"They were truly delicious, as fresh as if picked an hour before. It was the middle of January.

"I send you some photographs which will interest your readers, being illustrative of life in Persia. One shows a Nestorian woman from the mountains of Kurdistan, spinning wool. On her left forearm is some wool already combed, prepared to be spun. Another, a Mohammedan woman weaving carpet, in indoor costume. Still another shows a group baking bread and grinding corn. The woman on the right is at the grinding mill. A third woman is rolling dough under the roller. A young girl standing by has just brought fuel for the tandoor (stove). Another photograph is that of women spinning cotton and wool.

"Yesterday we called on a friend, and their principal room (which is used for cooking and warming), was occupied by three families of Armenian refugees. Eleven persons there eat, sit and sleep in one end of the house, and a primary day school is taught by the daughter of the house. They also give them dinner every day. The Christians of Urmia are doing all they can to help them. If it had not been for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's Armenian work, most of them would have perished from want of food and shelter.

"An eye-witness told me that hundreds of women and girls of tender age, were being sold, not very far from here, for one abasu (two cents), to one piece of gold ($4.50). Some Christians, in order to rescue a few of them, tried to buy them, but were told that their masters would not sell any to Christians but only to Mohammedans."

fifteen. There is a superstition among them that as soon as a girl is born, she looks toward the window, indicating that 'this house is not mine,' and that somewhere outside she looks toward the house of her future husband. At her birth no smiles greet her. The sounds of laughter and music are hushed by the news of the calamity that a girl is born in the house. No gifts, nor good news are sent to relatives and neighbors announcing the arrival of the new guest. Festivals and receptions are put off altogether. Sometimes the unwelcome girl baby is left in the cold and unattended for hours. Sometimes for years she is not petted or spoken to even kindly. Often she is not named for years. Even infanticide is practiced upon female infants by fathers or nurses. We knew a man who strangled his three-for and near and pays respect to the shrines. She goes with her spouse to Larballa and becomes Larballa Khanim (Lady Larballa). She goes to Mecca and becomes Hadgy Khanim. As the possessor of these titles she is feared and respected. There is no sin, she believes, that can bar her from heaven after she has paid the visits and received such titles.

"I paid a visit to a Christian village not far from the city of Urmia. After four hours of horseback riding through mud and snow, we reached the place. The narrow and crooked streets were made worse by the accumulation of snow that had fallen weeks before. But the sun was shining, and almost the whole village had emptied itself, the people being on the roofs, the men and children playing, and the women with their babies tied upon Corn-laden Trains on the Way from Many States More Letters from Missionary Distributors Describing India's Pitiful Condition Progress of the Famine.

If anything were needed to prove to the world that the American people are, above all other nations, alive to the call of human suffering, it is found in the magnificent generosity with which they have responded to the appeal in behalf of India. The past week has been the greatest in the history of the Famine Fund. Contributions have poured in, in a steady stream, from every State of the Union. Corn bins have been flung wide open, too, and the people have vied with each other in the work of loading cars with the life-saving grain, to be forwarded to New York for transport to India in the ships supplied by Congress for that purpose. Almost every hour brought to the headquarters of the Fund in the Bible House telegrams announcing that new carloads had been gathered by earnest, sympathizing souls, and were ready to be added to the long corn-laden trains now rushing from all points toward the Atlantic seaboard. Up to the present time, these States are represented in the gifts of corn to India—many of them by numerous cars, and all with a generosity that speaks volumes for the large-heartedness of their people:

Illinois, Ohio, Mississippi, Indiana, Wisconsin, Virginia, Nebraska, Kansas, Michigan, Missouri, N. Dakota, New York, Delaware, Georgia, S. Dakota, Kentucky, Minnesota.

In the West, whole States have been fired with enthusiasm for the relief movement by the visit of Rev. Dr. Talmage and Dr. Klopsch, and those associated with them in their tour. Continuing on the line indicated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of last week, a number of other Western cities were visited and immense audiences listened, while Dr. Talmage eloquently set before them the great need of perishing India. At Lincoln, Neb., over 3,000 persons crowded the Lansing Opera House, and gave earnest and sympathetic heed to the appeals of the speakers. Speaking of the great gathering at Omaha, the Daily Bee of that city editorially reminded the people of Nebraska of the aid rendered through the readers of this journal to that State in its time of need, after the great drought of three years ago, and advocated generous aid to India by way of grateful return. The Evening Call, on the same occasion, used this language:

The mission of these Christian people has been heralded over the State, and the fact that Omaha and Lincoln are the only favored places in Nebraska where they will speak has aroused increased interest in their coming and in their mission. Dr. Klopsch came to Nebraska two years ago, not on a begging tour, but as a ministering angel, to alleviate the suffering of Nebraskans who were afflicted with the drought, and distributed $27,000 in cash and thirty carloads of supplies.

Right nobly is Nebraska now repaying its debt of kindness, for advices from that State show that its generous-hearted people are in full sympathy with the relief work and doing all that lies in their power, by gift and prayer, to help the life-saving mission of the Famine Fund.

One of the most remarkable meetings held during the Western tour, was that at Rock Island, Ill., which was briefly referred to in last week's issue. Drs. Talmage and Klopsch and Miss Leitch delivered addresses to the great audience of 3,500, and hearts were so touched by the story of India's suffering, that a sufficient sum in money was contributed to save over a thousand lives, and corn enough pledged to feed thousands more.

Last of these gatherings was that which took place in the Auditorium, Chicago, on Monday, May 3d. Judge C. C. Bonney presided, and Dr. Talmage spoke for nearly forty minutes, producing a deep impression as he pleaded for India's helpless millions. Miss Margaret Leitch followed in a very touching address.

Throughout the entire trip, the people, press, pastors and officials in the West expressed the warmest sympathy with the Relief Work, and gave it their most generous support, and the result has been the addition of many thousands of dollars to the Famine Fund, and liberal pledges of corn, which are now being rapidly redeemed and the grain shipped to seaboard.

A CABLE APPEAL FROM INDIA.

In the Eastern and Middle States, also, the movement has received the spontaneous support of Christian people of all denominations and every condition of life. Many gifts to the Fund represent loving sacrifices made willingly for His sake, who went about feeding the hungry and relieving the suffering. Just how widespread and acute the real need of India is at the present time is shown by the following brief, but significant cablegram, forwarded by Chief Justice MacLean, Chairman of the Viceroy's Relief Committee at Calcutta, in response to a message of inquiry:

CALCUTTA, May 1.

Dr. Klopsch, New York.

"Warmest thanks. Famine and conseare both on the increase and both incurable. All reports to the contrary notwithstanding. Contributions in money to any extent can be immediately utilized here. There cannot be too much—every dollar saves lives. Thirty thousand people have died of the plague to date, and 200,000 of famine. What has happened is nothing to what is likely to come."

A VISIT TO A POOR-HOUSE.

Mr. Aitken, our own correspondent in India, writes: "I send you two photographs taken at my order during my visit to Banda, a town and district of the North West Provinces, which owing to poor soil and a shiftless population, has always, for centuries past, been in a state bordering on famine, even when the season was favorable. After the last great famine the Government had a railway made through the country, from Jhansi to Kutee, which has never paid; but it has saved thousands of lives in the present famine by enabling grain to be carried to the famishing people. The district of Banda borders on the independent native states of Bundelkhand, where the famine is at its very worst, and where relief measures were delayed till they were almost too late to be of avail. Starving people from these states streamed into British India for months: so that there seemed no end to the distress. Long after the famine in Banda, for instance, seemed to be completely under control, strangers kept cross-

313 when I visited the place, are sent in three rows to receive their food, and their earthen vessels before them. The cart has come in to carry away the things of straw on which the children sleep in the rooms round the sides.

"I have visited no poor-house where inmates are taken better care of than this one. The committee men, near native gentlemen, seem faithful and anxious in the charitable duty they have taken, while Mr. Wazir Mulhoo Khan, the Honorary Secretary, is in himself. He is an old Government servant, now occupying the position of Deputy Collector, which is a magistracy. He is a man of uncommon intelligence and boundless energy, but his labors in the famine work, added to the duties of his office, are so heavy, that he said that he was sometimes tempted himself whether death would not be preferable to his life of unremitting toil.

"A patch of ground outside of the town has been made into a vegetable garden, where the children are encouraged to employ themselves instead of doing nothing all day. There are many orphaned young to be left to themselves, and they are given in charge of older people whose kindness to them is quite natural. But there is a great question looming in the future after the famine shall have passed away, and that is: what is to be done with the thousands of orphans who have been rescued in poor-houses. To find work for them in a country where the market is always overstocked, is idle. But who is to train them in the arts of work? Are they to be allowed to grow up without education and without religion? Government may offer them schooling, but no one has authority over them, boys and girls are not to attend schools on their own accord. Missionaries of many denominations are willing to provide many of them as the means to support, and to have all appliances and arrangements for the education of youth. I shall like to see if Christian people in America, when appealed to for Indian Missions for the Indian famine, will remember this, and send generally to their own nation, for never were the resources of all the schools in India as much as they are now."

From the letters received from our missionary contributors in India in the week, we give elsewhere some very interesting extracts. Rev. R. A. W.

quent distress very severe. Every assistance therefore most welcome, and will be received with greatest gratitude.

SIR FRANCIS MACLEAN."

We would again urge all who wish to aid in this life-saving work, to organize their Committees at once. All local Famine Fund Committees, or those connected with such Committees or those who are willing to act on Committees or wishing to organize Committees, are earnestly requested to send their full names and addresses to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in order that they may receive full instructions, circulars and other printed material.

Cars of corn are now coming rapidly forward, and as fast as received in New York are inspected, graded and made ready for shipment. Large storage space has been given free for the use of the Fund, and the preparation of the cargoes goes on energetically. We ask Committees to aid us in every way to save time. The earlier the corn reaches us, the sooner will it reach its ultimate destination in famine-stricken India.

Emphatic confirmation of the reports which the missionaries have sent of the appalling destitution and suffering comes in a letter from Mr. Julian Hawthorne the well known American writer who is now in India. Writing to Mr. John Brisson Walker from Bombay on March 23, Mr. Hawthorne says: "The plague and famine

ing the border to crowd the poor-houses, or to die. Very early one morning I saw a poor woman sitting on a hillside too weak to walk and almost naked. She said she had come in during the night, and named a town over the border. The same morning I saw a baby boy sitting at the door of the poor-house. He said his mother had put him there and gone away. She proved to be a native of Bundelkhand.

"I had the photographer take a picture of the house maintained at Bombay by the mission there of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. This poor-house is apart from the large Government relief houses in the same place. I was personally shown this place by the Rev. J. R. Hill. The emaciated condition of several of the inmates illustrates my remarks written above. I was much interested in a blind old man who had been taught to read his own language in Moon's system, and could find his place in the Gospel of John quite easily.

"The other photograph shows the children's relief house at Banda. It is situated in another part of the town altogether from the poorhouse for adults which I visited when it had 900 inmates. Both are conducted by the Government, with the help of a committee of citizens. This relief house is the largest I have seen for children. It is in a sarai, and the picture shows very well what the inside of a sarai is like. The children, of whom there were of Ahmednagar, writes:

I have just been informed of the $500,000 which has been given to the Famine Relief Fund by the Christians in America for the relief of India in a Christian and wise way. I shall give it mainly as remuneration in the moderate way for some kind of work, which will be of lasting benefit. Accordingly, I have made to use this money in starting four wells in the district of Ahmednagar, where the water supply is quite inadequate. Indian pastors will have the supervision of the digging of these wells in the villages. We are getting water without much difficulty. Through your fund will furnish work and aid to a goodly number of Christians, and to some Christians under the supervision of good men.

In the Ahmednagar district of Western India, distress is now quite acute. The heat is intense, and the water supply is very low. In itself a great distress and a source of widespread disease. There are multitudes of the poor who cannot help.

Before using any of the money, I handed it over to our senior lady missionary, Mrs. M. J. Sell, who has many women for whom she is responsible.

THE SUFFERING IN OUDH.

Rev. W. A. Mansell, of Lucknow, writes: "Having just returned from a missionary tour in the famine districts of Oudh, I am able to give some information as to the extent of suffering it has caused among our poor Christians and recent converts. From the time that we began our work in Oudh till we returned to Lucknow, where we saw the same thing—scarcity and starvation. Thousands of people to be seen on all the roads and in the towns working for the pittance which enables them to hold soul and body together. Our Christian community seemed in by one-half. Schools were closed, congregations scattered, homes left desolate because of the numbers who had left to work on the roads, or to seek employment wherever it might be offered. Many were lured by false hopes and wandered helplessly about on the verge of starvation, or begging promiscuously in the streets. I asked the pastor at one station the poorhouse, 'Is it true that the servants and under officials steal from the unfortunate inmates their share of meal?' 'Of course,' he said, 'and that is not the worst of it. They steal the meal and in its place mix dirt and sand. This adulterated meal when cooked, poisons the stomach and causes the face and hands to break out with loathsome eruptions resembling worms. These eruptions spread rapidly, and in a short time the patient dies.' At Bangar Mow at the Quarterly Conference, our preachers told of several Christians living in distant villages in the vicinity of Muradabadganj, who had literally starved to death, with no one near to care for or succor them.

We decided to stop at Muradabadganj for ourselves, and in the day we there saw enough to more than justify the distressing accounts our preachers given. As soon as it was known that we were there, the starving Christians began to gather. We could not eat till we had first fed them something. Some were seen or fifteen living skeletons collapsed at our door, and some of them had the first meal they had had for a long day. One old man was too weak from starvation to get from his cot; his young daughter came and took him the food. We feared we would be unable to do him any good. The wretched people whom we fed that day were too weak to stand or even sit long, but lay out in groups of hopeless, helpless dejection. We had tried to obtain employment on the roads from government relief officers, or gain admission to some of the poor-houses, but were turned away with the remark that they must go to their 'Missionary padri sahib' for help. 'A' thus they were left to starve, merely because they were Christians.

Although we had no money of any kind at our disposal, we gave order that they should be provided for, till they could obtain employment, or be able to provide for themselves. Thus we started our first Christian poorhouse on faith, and I am glad to say that up to the present all our expenses have been met. I am quite sure that our timely arrival has saved the lives of at least a dozen Christians in this district alone, and have kept a number more from dire diseases consequent upon the famine.

At one village we were about to visit and enquire, a woman, who we heard was ill. Her husband had been baptized, and was now absent at some other place in search of employment. We found the poor woman stretched out on a bundle of straw seemingly in the last stages of exhaustion from famine. It was with difficulty that we raised her from her stupor. One of the little boys at her side, himself literally starving, was entrusted with a small sum and left him with instructions to feed his mother such food as she could bear, promising to send again in a day or two. I am glad to say that the woman is in a fair way to recovery.

With reference to our Christians being refused Government aid, or admission to relief works, or to poor-houses, I may say that although in some places our people have enjoyed equal advantages with all other persons, yet this complaint has met with a large sections of the country which we saw.

The best course to pursue is to accept of timely aid from the Government in places where the administration is fairly carried out, and in other places to do the best we can for our people. We hail with delight the consecrated Christian contributions that are now being made, the disposition of which will be in Christian hands. There are dark days yet ahead of us, but this at least, is an element of brightness.

'It takes money to deal with distress, and we have distress on a large scale to deal with. We have the sick now, but I am thinking after good times come again in India there will be no end of chronic sufferers to deal with. Little children will crowd our orphanages and will be a constant item of expense until they grow up. Then the whole country is panic-stricken; the oxen are sold off and butchered; the people are scattered, or so weakened by starvation, that when the rains fall again, the fields will not be planted. The country will be filled with men and women partly able to work, but who will not be where work is to be had. There is a sort of unwritten law that we help no one until his knee is the biggest part of his leg, and until there is that indescribable expression about his eyes and mouth. We may help lots of people who are suffering from their own folly or who are personally unworthy, but we help no one who is not actually starving.'

IN THE VILLAGES.

Rev. C. H. Bandy, Presbyterian, Fatehpur, another missionary distributor, writes: 'Fatehpur is declared a famine district, and while it is not the very worst, yet it is their tracks from fatigue or starvation. HOW THE CHILDREN SUFFER.

'A very large proportion of the inmates of poor-houses and relief works are children. In our Mission compound at Fatehpur, seventy-five per cent. of the people are children. During last week we picked up more than eighty children. Owing to the fact that many of the children who are missing from the villages are not dead, it is difficult to get at the real mortality among them. I am, however, confident that it is much greater than among men and women. I think it is fair to say that in a village of 300 people not less than twenty, young and old, have died from actual starvation. Many do not hesitate in putting the death rate at ten per cent., but I think that a little high. You will notice that my figures are far above the government reports, but the government reports are not to be relied upon. One illustration is in point. In our district are twenty police circles. During last week the police reported 127 as having died through starvation in one of these circles. When the thing came to the collector's notice he demanded of the police superintendent that he alter the returns, reporting a considerable number of these deaths as due to fever and other causes. The police officer refused to make the alteration, but promised to be more careful about such details in future. It is my opinion that the number 127 does not be-

I am sure, had been in the poor-house and were not reported dead, and are supposed to be yet alive, enjoying poor-house bill of fare at government expense.

"THE PEOPLE ARE DYING!"

'I presume you have heard the report that no one need die in India from starvation. As I have already said, the people are dying and it is only fair to presume that few of them die from choice. The government poor-houses are unpopular. The relief works are not properly distributed. Then a man goes to the relief works and the first day's wages are withheld as a sort of insurance against bad conduct. The first money he will see is at the end of the second day. He says in his heart 'I am starving now, and if I am to work till to-morrow night or day after to-morrow night' as the case would be if he lives far from the camp, 'I will die,' so he keeps on trying to make it on buds and small fruits till he is so weak he cannot get to either camp or poor-house, and there is no one to help him. The statement, therefore, that no one need die of starvation except it be from his own fault, is not only false but exceedingly stupid. I am not railing against the Government. No Government has ever done so much. No Government ever had so great a task. I know two magistrates who are literally killing themselves with work, trying to keep people from starvation, and those men are the frankest to admit that they cannot begin to meet the demand. I know other magistrates (lazy fellows!) who have not lost a pound of flesh, who get off that stereotyped piece of stupidity to us people who know the conditions.'

OUR COLORED PICTURE.

The picture on the first page is a typical scene of native magnificence in the days before the famine. It represents the arrival of one of the native Rajahs at the gates of Lucknow. The British government has always received these native grandees on their visits to British India with elaborate courtesy. Many of them are men of illustrious pedigree, and some of them still possess enormous wealth. On state occasions they come with large retinue and in great splendor to pay visits of ceremony to the representatives of the British Empire, with whom they are anxious to live in amity. It is remarkable that now, as in former famines, the majority of them show less solicitude about the welfare of their subjects, though they are of their own race, than does the British government, which is stigmatized as of alien race. There have, however, been in this time of need some instances among wealthy natives, especially in British India, of open-hearted liberal beneficence.

The example of relief from Christian sources has evidently impressed them and, although the native rulers are doing little if anything for their people, several large donations for famine relief have come from native hands. The Governor General's Famine Relief Committee, also, has on its membership representative natives of distinction who are assisting in direct relief measures.

HASTE NECESSARY.

Little time now remains in which to complete the corn cargoes, and we ask all who are interested in this particular branch of the relief work to make haste. A day lost means the prolongation of much suffering; a day gained means the saving of precious lives. If all work together with a will now, long before the month closes, the relief ships will be speeding across the ocean toward India.

among the more afflicted of the declared famine districts. I have taken pains to inform myself of the conditions all around us, viz: Allahabad, Banda Rai Bareilly Etawah, Jhansi, Fatehgarh and Cawnpore districts. Out of this list Jhansi and Banda are probably worse off than Fatehpur, but Fatehpur will come in as third in distress. I have visited not less than thirty villages, and find the condition of things truly dreadful. It is hard to get at the exact mortality. My plan has been to go into a village say of three hundred inhabitants and to ask about the condition of things in general; then to ask how many have died of famine. Not infrequently I am told that half the village have died. Of course I know that is not true. Then I begin to ask who has died. Well, they begin to give names only of men, and they generally have trouble to remember more than from eight to ten or twelve men. I then ask about women. Then come the poor little children. They are, after all, the real sufferers, and it is difficult to get at the real amount of suffering and death among them. A man or woman will lie down when they get hungry, but a child wanders in search of buds and small fruits. Go in any direction you will and you can pick up little boys and girls who are either on the hunt for something to eat or have fallen in gin to tell the story of the actual mortality.

'Our compound at Fatehpur is filled with honest, hard-working people, who have kept on till now by selling their oxen and other belongings for little or nothing, and now that they have nothing more to sell, they must be helped or die. You simply cannot imagine their condition. Skin and bone! You wonder how their bones hang together. When we begin to feed them, men act like children, cry and beg for more, and one is always tempted to give too much. I have an acquaintance who is in charge of a relief camp where about 1,200 people are employed. He says there is a death-rate from diarrhoea alone of 30 per day. The police report an average of 11. My friend's word may be relied on.

'Near a poor-house in the other part of the district is a mango orchard. Mr. Forman and I blundered into it, and there we found numbers of skeletons torn limb from limb by jackals. Most of them had died within a week or so. These people, Nature's Annual Procession.

IT is coming, to the song of the blue-bird and the robin; grass and leaves and flowers and the waving fields of grain. The springs and streams have been given their holiday, and go frolicking down the hillsides and along the valleys toward the great rivers, which swell grandly to the sea. The cattle come out on the mountains, and bring down to the people their udders stretched with the fresh milk, on which the farmer's children grow to strong youth and manhood and womanhood. The year moves on to the century, which will soon confront the nations.

Then sing, ye birds, sing, sing a joyous song,
And let the young lambs bound
As to the tabor's sound.

CROCUSES AND DAFFODILS.

The first new-comers always get the warmest welcome. Like the first runner with good tidings, they seem to tell the whole story. Spring is come! The details will be told later. But, now we recognize the victory of life over death; the utter rout of winter's forces. The rest of the procession are on the way; the violets and the roses, and all their kindred. The crocuses and daffodils are the advance guard. They have made no mistake. The procession has started.

A bunch of May we've brought you,
And at the door it stands;
It is hilt a sprout,
But it's well budded out.
By the work of our Lord's hands.

THE SEED-TIME OF THE YEAR.

The farmer has to be on time for this procession of Nature. If he does not connect at the right point, where he has been assigned a place in the programme, he will be omitted, and the procession will pass on without him. The grain must be sown, the corn and potatoes put under ground. What bareheaded boy does not remember the salt touch of mellow earth, as he has gone out for the first time in the spring to work in the fields? And soon comes the hoeing of the corn and the potatoes, and the corn tassels out and the potato vines are in bloom. The corn and potatoes well started, the procession moves on to haying and harvest. Every day has its duty. Every week wins a victory over Nature.

THE FARMER'S BOY.

He is little noticed in these days, but he is very important. He is like the small coin, that is needed in all money transactions. He is the errand boy. He catches the horses and rides them to town. He takes the place of the hired man, goes with the maids to the milking;

in short is the factotum without which the farm processes would stop. This is the first year he ever earned any money of his own. It is not much. But it may be the beginning of his fortune. The way a boy uses his first money often reveals his future. John D. Rockefeller used to give one cent a week to the Sunday School, and he put that down in his ledger, from which he read to the young men in a Bible class the other day. Every farmer's boy ought to keep a ledger to read from forty years later.

LOVE OF COUNTRY.

It is an old saying, "God made the country, man made the town." There is some truth in it. There is much that is artificial, man made in town life. The houses have to be built in a certain style and painted a certain color; the fences made in a certain way; a certain kind of tree set out in the front yard, and so with everything else. But go into the woods, and see what God is doing there; see how he is moving on his undisturbed affairs; listen to the purling brook, and watch the minnows as they glide; hear the birds as they talk over their plans of nest-building. Go into the fields and watch the bees gather sweets from the clover; see the nest of the ground-sparrow full of eggs. There is nothing artificial here. It is all liberty and joy. Do you love the country? Love it more.

FARMERS' PEOPLE.

Some of our happiest days have been spent among them. We have delighted to unbuckle life's harness and put on loose garments and go into the fields with them, to spread or rake hay, or load it upon the cart. We have liked their honest, simple-hearted welcome, their substantial fare, their reverence around the family altar. Strangely enough, they seem to fill a large place in our recollections. And yet we have spent only a small part of our life in the country, and country people have been only a small minority of our acquaintances. It must be a law of nature. Everybody wants a farm, everybody likes farmers' people; Daniel Webster, William M. Everts, all the great men. Well they loved horses and cattle, the soil, the crops, all farmers' things. And so do we.

Holy Sacraments.

THE sacred banquets of the churches ought to be more emphasized. The Communion Table ought to be a place of military prospect. Having sharpened our swords and burnished our armor and marshalled our battalions, we ought to come upon the ground of struggle and see something of the enemy that is to be conquered.

The Communion Table ought to be a place of great gathering. As the spies went into the promised land and brought back grapes, some of the clusters so large that it took two men to carry them on a staff, so we press the grapes into the sacramental cup, and we drink of the joys of the church of Jesus Christ. We drink to the memory of past victory. We drink to the joy of those who have already attained the prize. Seated amid such blessed circumstances and with such a glorious opportunity of salvation, does it not seem as if we had presented to us the full, large, ripe grapes of Eshcol?

The Communion Table ought also to be a Father's table. As on Christmas or Thanksgiving Day, our families gather from the East, and the West, and the North and the South, and recount the perils through which they have passed, and the enjoyments in which they have mingled, and talk over their prospects of the future; so we ought to gather at our Father's table—"one Lord, one faith, one baptism." Born of the same Heavenly Father, and on the way to the same glorious home, are we not all brethren and sisters in Jesus Christ? "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

THE INFLUENCE OF ANGELS.

THERE is no doctrine more clearly taught in the Bible than that of angelic and demoniacal agency. Does God open the eyes of our understanding? The devil is said to blind them. Are Christians filled with the spirit? "Why?" asks Peter of Ananias, "why hath Satan filled thy heart?" Does God work in us to will and to do? Satan worketh in the children of disobedience.

The good angels mentioned in the Old Testament are generally manifestations of the Deity, and not created personages. In this they differ in a very remarkable manner from the angelic messengers of the new dispensation, to none of whom worship is offered, or rather by whom it is never accepted. In this connection we may notice that Jesus, both before and after his passion, permitted himself to be worshipped. Many of those whom he healed rendered him this homage unrepented, and in Matthew 28:9, we are told that the two Marys coming from the sepulchre where they had seen an angel to whom they offered no marks of adoration, met Jesus, and held him by the feet and worshipped him. It is evident then that their eyes discerned the difference between the Master and the messenger.

The subject of demoniacal possession has caused a great deal of disputation, and yet there is no need for any explanation of the Word. It may be taken just as it is written. Many prominent theologians assert the "possession" to have been lunatics. That they were not lunatics is evident from Matthew 24:24, where the "diseased," the "possessed" and the "lunatics," are separately and distinctly named. Also we are particularly told of several kinds of devils, dumb, deaf, unclean spirits of infirmity, &c., all of which could not be classed under the head of "lunatics." Neither was "possession" confined to Judea and the Jewish nation. In Acts 16:16 we are told of a damsel of Philippi in Macedonia, a Roman colony, who had a spirit of divination, and the word "enthusiast" in the original Greek is synonymous with "one possessed."

It is evident then that we must accept the plain Scripture account, or else believe Christ to have been either an impostor or an enthusiast. And this belief would include also all who saw and acknowledged the verity of his exorcism. But the miracle which sent the legion of devils to inhabit the swine, seems in an admirable manner to refute this supposition. For if men are liable to wild and superstitious fancies certainly beasts are not, while the calm, reasonable life and temper of Jesus was as much above a wild and fanciful enthusiasm as the swine were below it.

It is remarkable that in the early part of the Bible the devil and his angels are seldom named, but that as the time draws near for Christ's revelation, the world becomes familiar with this evil agency. Nor is it unreasonable to suppose that the visible overthrow and audible acknowledgment of devils was part of Christ's mission on earth. That they dreaded his voice as having authority to end their temporary enlargement is certain. Their entreaties and objections are an acknowledgment of his power to consign them at once to that

The evil ones do trail unhallowed wings.

Of course it is urged that we have no such manifestations at the present day. This is by no means certain. Those who have seen and studied men "possessed" by the demons of strong drink, lust, avarice, anger, &c., have seen men whom the devil led captive at his will. Nor over such has the name of Jesus lost its power. Do we not all know what miracles that name—coupled with love and faith—can work? Nay, what Christian is there who has not with a word of prayer, barred the gates of hell and commanded "Get thee behind me Satan," and been obeyed.

The good angels seem to know no higher bliss than service. Whenever we read of them it is as helpers and comforters. They rejoice over our repentance, they minister continually to our sorrows and our necessities. Those who doubt this have not that knowledge that comes by suffering. They have not stretched into an open grave an unclasped hand, or waved it in a mute farewell to friends from whom they must walk apart forever. They have borne in silence that hardest of all griefs—a grief not sure—they have not hungered for eternity, they have not been brought low, or they would know how he helps such. How? That is the heart's secret. No one can interfere with another's spiritual joy, but the consolation is none the less tangible and personal. Ask those who have been in sore temptation and "fought their doubts, and gathered strength." The broken in heart, the eyes washed and cleared by consecrating tears, the feet that have been to the "Border Land," they know.

Therefore let us take the Biblical doctrine of angelic agency just as it is written, without apology or explanation, and this also because it includes the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead and the communion of saints, a belief to be tenderly cherished in an age when everything drifts toward materialism. For not only in ancient Jewry, but also in modern Christendom there are Sadducees who "say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit."

BRIEF NOTES.

Evangelist C. H. Yatman has been holding a series of union evangelistic meetings at Elkhart, Ind. Churches of different denominations in the entire city united in the movement.

The Committee of Arrangements for the International Council of Congregational Churches to be held in Boston in 1899, has provided that English friends will name the month and day it will probably begin either May 30 or July 1.

An important conference of the N. Y. W. C. T. U. was held in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on May 5. Among the speakers were Miss Florence Kingsley, Mrs. Elizabeth Wood, Mrs. Frances J. Barnes and Miss I. Willard.

The United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, at its jubilee year shows a most flourishing condition. The increase of membership during the year is 2,582, the largest reported since 1840. The income for congregational purposes is $60,000, and for missionary and benevolent purposes of nearly $12,000.

Very successful revival services have been held at Ravenswood, Chicago. The church uniting in the movement were the Baptist, Christian, the United Presbyterian and the Methodist Congregational. It is believed that four hundred persons were led during the time to begin a new life in Christ's strength.

A United Society of Christian Endeavor for India, Burma and Ceylon was formed Oct. 29, 1896. Its first president is Rev. Julian, the pastor of the Calcutta church; by Carey, and the field secretary is Mr. Sunday school secretary for India, who formed the first Christian Endeavor Society in Wales.

The Central Woman's Christian Temperance Union has issued a warning to you against some of the drinks sold at the soda fountain. The ordinary soda and the pho are perfectly harmless, but many drug-stores added to their variety drinks which contain toxicating ingredients. These often bear names.

The widow of the late Baron de Hirs decided to establish a home for working women. Hon. Oscar S. Straus and Mrs. have been in consultation with her as to the which are not yet perfected. Mme. de Hirs expects to spend two million dollars upon of which will be for buildings, and part of the cost.

Rev. John McNeill, "the Scottish Spunk" preached on May 2d, in the Marble Church, New York, in the morning, and in the Avenue Presbyterian Church in the afternoon. McNeill is here in response to an invitation by a hundred American ministers who expect to welcome him and are praying that a rich life will attend his labors.

A novel proposition for the removal of a church is reported from Hartford, Conn. The building is constructed of Portland brown with a spire 212 feet high made entirely of stone. It is proposed to take the building down, man stone, and rebuild about a mile and a-half from the present site, which it has occupied since 1824. The cost of removal is estimated at about $100,000.

A Brooklyn pastor, on a recent Sunday, suffering from a severe cold, and when he was through his sermon his voice, which had been from the beginning, completely failed. He called his wife to come to the pulpit and finish his manuscript. This she did in a clear voice. The pastor recovered his voice sufficiently to close the service. Referring to the service he had rendered, he said: "A friend in need is indeed."

The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, South, has closed its fiscal year without a debt. The receipts for the year were $143,799, a gain on those of the previous year of $1,009. The balance at the close of the year was $2,223; the balance at the close of the year only $224. This is due to the fact that the has been considerably enlarged. The number of missionaries on the roll is 150 against 141 ago, and other departments are correspondingly increased.

Dr. F. E. Clark expects to reach Liverpool on his return from his round-the-world tour to sail for America on the Britannia. He will spend a few days in New York and to Boston before starting for San Francisco to attend the international convention. Arrangements are being made for sending a delegate each eastern district to the convention. The cost of the trip—$140—and the time it will take—a whole month—will diminish the attendance at the east.

Pastor Archibald G. Brown has had of blessing in Denver, Colo. The meeting commenced in Trinity M. E. Church, and closed the Central Presbyterian Church. Mr. Brown in his farewell address that at no place ever enjoyed such loving fellowship with ministers. Two meetings were held except Saturdays, and on Sundays Mr. Brown preached three times. The audiences were many people coming from other sections of the State to hear the famous preacher.

The death of Dr. James H. Brookes, Louisville, Mo., will be deeply mourned by a large number of friends. Dr. Brookes had been suffering for months, but a period of rest at Stafford, Miss., seemed to have done him so much good that he returned to St. Louis and resumed his work. He preached an eloquent sermon on April 11, following day he caught cold and was forced to his bed. He continued to grow worse, and the following Sunday morning sank into a coma from which he never awakened.

It is probable that the Moderator of the next General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church will be Dr. Sheldon Jackson, the eminent Alaskan, whose forty years of service in Alaska, Minnesota, and the mountains of Canada crown of glory on his head. As the sub-foreign Missions will be a prominent one in the Assembly, it has been thought fitting that the distinguished commissioner from Alaska would be a graceful thing to seat him in the front row, but if that cannot be done without a contest, but if that cannot be done, it is a fitting indication of the Assembly's action of his life of service.

AND THE NEWSPAPER

CRISIS IN GREECE.

INTEREST in the conflict between Turkey and Greece has been turned by recent events from the frontier to the capital. The news of the retreat of the Greeks from Larissa and ineffective movements of the navy, as a public disturbance in Athens was distinctly hostile to the King, was a demonstration in front of the Palace, loudly uttered menaces in the public resorts and were in the press, and members of the family were insulted in the streets, yielding to the clamor so far as Premier Delvannis and his colleagues installed Mr. Ralli and the opposition in their places. Staff of the Crown Prince was also seized, in consequence of the charge of ability and experience had passed over and clever courtiers had trusted with high commands, for they had no capacity. The panic that which occurred in Paris, when France changed from a monarchy to a republic. The concessions of the King conciliated the opposition, danger to his dynasty is not yet past. The people are determined to hold George and his son responsible for the disasters, the full extent of which is not clearly understood. So far as can be gathered from the contradictory disclosures, it appears that the Greeks were in a state of being surrounded and their communications being cut off. In the midst of an enemy more numerous, better armed, and ready to fight with fanatical desperation, retreat may have been necessary for the preservation of the army. It was conducted at the time in an orderly manner, and only at a moment when some mistake occurred, as there any disorder or panic. The Greeks have shown themselves capable of fighting, and in all the engagements showed their courage and tenacity; they are hopelessly outnumbered, and are opposed by skillful generals who know how to make the best use of their advantage. There seems little hope now of the Greeks being able to retrieve their losses, though they avow their determination of continuing the struggle. It is possible that the Powers may intervene to save Greece from further disaster, but without intervention, Greece seems to be at the mercy of the Turk. The situation is a sad one, but it is illogical for the King to hold the king responsible for it. The King was averse to declaring war, and yielded to public pressure. He probably foresaw the issue of the unequal struggle into which his people were forcing him against his better judgment. His situation was one that demanded firmness; it was so evidently like that of the man whom Christ spoke:

"I am going to make war against another nation, not down first, and consulteth with me; he be able with ten thousand to meet me; cometh against him with twenty thousand." (Luke 14: 31.)

Shared with Her Body.

The story of the brave deed of a twelve-year-old girl is related by the San Francisco Call. The heroine, whose name was Carmen, was the daughter of a miner who resided here, only one other child, a boy, was years old. Carmen was a bright, prematurely womanly owing to the illness which came upon her through the delicate health of her mother. They lived in a poor structure of only two rooms, but it was a happy home, for a very strong affection bound together all four members of the family. One night, while another of the family was suffering from an illness, and Carmen had passed a long day attending on her sick mother, she was thinking after her young brother, because he was usually cleaning, which, to say the least, was not very thorough, the father went to the mine, it being his turn for work. The other three went to bed and were soon sound asleep. During the night Carmen waked and saw, to her horror, that the roof of the shanty was on fire, having probably been ignited from the cracked adobe chimney. She called to her mother, and ran to the bedside of her little brother to arouse him. But he was frightened, and clung convulsively to the side of his crib. As she tried to get him away she saw a burning brand fall on the box at the foot of her mother's bed. Instantly she ran to it and brushed it off, for she knew that her father kept his giant powder in that box. In her excitement she tripped and fell, and when she tried to rise she could not, for her leg was broken. The poor girl was almost frantic in her helplessness. She crawled to the box and stretched herself upon it, shrieking to her mother to save herself and the child. The mother, barely able to move, succeeded in getting the boy out of bed, and going to the door, shouted for help. It was some minutes before any one came. The mother pointed to the room where Carmen still lay on the box. They went in and carried the poor girl out. She had lain still, keeping the sparks off the box with her body, and she was burned from head to foot. They did all they could for her, but she died the next day. Her last words were to her little brother: "Kiss me, Tommy; I've saved you, and I'm so happy!" If that boy should forget the memory of the brave sister who saved his life at the cost of her own, what an ingrate we should deem him! Yet how many there are who, though they know that Christ died for them, never love him or do anything for his sake!

Who has his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree that we being dead to sins should live unto righteousness. (1. Peter 2: 24.)

A Brave Man in Prison.

A dispatch from Cheyenne, Wyo., reports a pathetic incident in the State penitentiary there. Lectures are occasionally given to the convicts by kind-hearted people of the neighborhood. An entertainment of this kind was given recently by Captain Varnum, of the State University. In the course of his lecture he described Custer's disastrous fight on the Little Big Horn. Captain Varnum had a narrow escape from that massacre. He belonged to Custer's command and was not far away from the scene of death. His position was almost surrounded by the Indians for several days. The men were partially protected by trenches and so long as they remained in shelter they were safe. But there was a scarcity of water and the only way to obtain it was for one of the men to steal down from the trenches to the river, fill a bucket and return. During the trip to and from the man would be exposed to the Indian fire and many were wounded and some killed on the way. The Captain would not order any man to undertake the perilous duty, but left it to volunteers. In speaking the other day to the convicts, he described the readiness of the men in his command to thus risk their lives, not one shrank from the duty. It needed more courage than to go into battle because the man had absolutely no means of defence. At the close of his lecture one of the convicts spoke to the Captain, who recognized him at once as a man who had been in his command and had been conspicuous in doing the duty he had just described.

The man was serving a sentence of eight years imprisonment for larceny and has still six years to serve. Captain Varnum expressed his regret at seeing him there and has promised to intercede with the Governor for his release. It may be hoped he will be successful, for it is sad that a man capable of so brave an act should be in prison. The Governor, however, may not feel justified in releasing him, as in law a good act cannot be held to atone for crime. While people recognize this principle in social life they too often forget it in considering God's government and vainly hope that he will pardon wrongdoing in consideration of self-inflicted penances or bequests to charity.

For though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap, yet thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord God. (Jer. 2: 22.)

The Oldest History.

To the credit of American enterprise belongs the discovery of the oldest history in the world. It consists of about three thousand baked tablets and clay vases covered with inscriptions which have been found in a huge mound covering the ancient city of Nippur, in the land of the Chaldeans. The work among these Assyrian ruins has been carried on for five years past under the auspices of the University of Pennsylvania, but it is only recently that the historical value of the discoveries has been fully understood. The work is very far from completion, but enough has been read to show that the events described on the vases occurred before the building of Babylon, and as Dr. Hilprecht believes, at least seven thousand years ago. The excavations in which they were found, show that four cities successively occupied the site, each of the later three built on the ruins of its predecessor. The inscribed bricks of the upper city bear the name of King Ur Bau, who is thought to have belonged to the dynasty from which the district mentioned Gen. 11: 28 derived its name. The city, the ruins of which occupy the stratum above that of Ur, was built, as the inscriptions on its bricks show, by King Sargon and his son Naram Sin who flourished 3500-3750 years before Christ. Penetrating below this level, through debris thirty-five feet thick, the explorers found the pavement of a still older city, and again below that, on the virgin soil, the remains of the original settlement, in which was a huge enclosure which had evidently been used as a temple, in which was an altar piled high with bone ashes of many sacrifices. The records show a high state of civilization and are clearly the most ancient yet discovered. If they are correctly deciphered, as there is no reason to doubt, we must conclude that they are the records of a civilization more ancient than any yet known to us. The presence of the altar, however, shows that even at that time, there was in the human mind a sense of accountability to some divine power whom it was necessary to propitiate. As we think of the people of that remote time groping darkly after God, we realize the truth of the Apostle's argument in proof of the responsibility of those to whom he has been revealed.

The times of ignorance, therefore God overlooked, but now he commandeth men that they should all everywhere repent. (Acts 17: 30 R.V.)

Lost Identity.

The doctors in Bellevue Hospital New York are puzzled by the condition of a patient who has been under their care for several weeks. The man entered the hospital of his own accord and asked for treatment. He gave his name as Charles Kaufman, but he was in a dazed state and expressed a doubt as to whether that was really his name. It was at first supposed that he had been drinking heavily, but after two or three days he was still bewildered and could not be sure as to his identity. It was then perceived that his condition was not the result of drink. He talks coherently about his early years, and remembers being in the German army in the Franco-Prussian war. He describes his boyhood home and minutely recalls the incidents of several battles in which he was engaged. He remembers coming to New York after the war, but after that event, he remembers nothing. He thinks he has two children but is not certain. His memory is an utter blank as to all recent events, even those of the day he came to the hospital. Prof. C. L. Dana and other learned men have questioned him, but are unable to find the cause of his loss of identity. The man himself is greatly distressed by it and begs that his case may be made known as widely as possible, in the hope that his family, if he has one, may know of the calamity which has befallen him. The doctors think he must have suffered some injury to the brain, probably a blow which has affected his memory. The man's uneasiness shows that there is some power within him, fretting because of the imperfection of the instrument with which it has to work. Other men have been conscious of this duality who have not had it forced on their attention in so strange a way. To all such the prospect of a new and better organism held out in the Bible is very encouraging.

It doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him. (1. John 3: 2.)

Depreciated Stock.

A correspondent of a Chicago journal describes a strange spectacle he witnessed recently in a country village in Ohio. It is that of a store fully stocked and regularly opened for business from which nothing is ever sold. It appears that the proprietor was in business before the war and did a good trade. During the war, prices went up, but he sold at small profits and continued to prosper. But with the proclamation of peace came the sudden collapse of values, and it found him with a large stock on hand. He had made a small fortune and was not pressed for money, so he held on to his stock, hoping that there would be a rebound of prices. But the rise has never come. The old man would not recognize the logic of the situation, and firmly refused to sell his goods at a loss. He has opened his store every business day for more than thirty years and has kept his goods in order, but no customer ever enters. He has on his shelves goods which cost him sixty cents, which can now be bought at retail for five cents, but he will not sell them below cost. The eccentric old man has no relatives, and does not appear to relish advice from friends. He leads the life of a hermit and spends his time contentedly among his goods and not worrying over the absence of customers. He believes implicitly that prices will yet go up to the old figure, and he declares that he can afford to wait. Every business man can see the folly of such a course, but it is often difficult to get Christians to realize how the principle applies to spiritual things, and to make a new estimate of their prized things as the Apostle did.

Howbeit what things were gain to me, I have counted loss for Christ. Yea, verily, and I count all things to be loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ. (Phil. 3: 7.)

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

The Conference at Jerusalem.

Sunday School Lesson for May 23d. Acts

15: 1-29. Golden Text: Acts 15: 11.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

HE two primitive missionaries, Paul and Barnabas, when the Holy Ghost, the same faithful Leader who had sent them forth (Acts 13: 4), showed them that their term of ministry in foreign lands was ended for the present, returned to Antioch, from whence they had been recommended to the grace of God for the works which they fulfilled. The Church at Antioch could not have sent them forth so solemnly in obedience to the Holy Ghost without continuing to bear them up continually in prayer, and they felt a responsibility to tell this faithful church how God had answered their prayers for them. They held at Antioch the first missionary meeting on record, and "rehearsed all that God had done with them, and how he had opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles."

New light on the Word and on the purposes of God is sure to awaken opposition among those who have not yet understood it. News of the work among the Gentiles was carried to Judea, and certain men came down from Judea to Judaize the converts from among the Gentiles. They preached, "Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, ye cannot be saved." Paul and Barnabas had no small and disputation with them. But dissension and disputation do not build up the Church of God, and do not convince men: a man can receive nothing except it be given him from heaven (John 3: 27), and Paul and Barnabas had yet to learn that all their blessed success among the Gentiles did not make them in themselves one whit more powerful to open one closed heart of Jew or Gentile to the truth of God. Thus it came about that the Church at Antioch sent the two missionary brethren with some others up to Jerusalem, to take counsel with the apostles and elders about this question. On their journey—very unlike one of the rapid journeys of our time—they were "brought on their way by the Church," i. e., members of the church in the places where they stopped gave them hospitality, and they on their part "caused great joy unto all the brethren" by declaring among them the conversion of the Gentiles. Every simple child of God rejoices in the tidings of the salvation of souls by the way who they may. It is only such as take upon themselves to preserve the purity of their doctrine in the spirit of caste and exclusiveness who are in danger of sacrificing souls to their own narrowness: "We forbid him because he followeth not us," was a spirit rebuked by the Master (Mark 9: 38).

Arrived at Jerusalem, they were at first received with open arms by the apostles and elders, and "they declared all that God had done with them." But the same opposition which the sacerdotal party of those days had manifested in Antioch, appeared also in Jerusalem. While the precious tidings of God's grace among so many in Asia Minor was being told out, the spirit of the company was disturbed by this contrary element, and the question of circumcision and of keeping the law of Moses was brought up. A synod of the church was called to decide the matter, and again the spirit of disputation got the mastery. Surely the hand of the enemy was in this! Peter, by nature, always first, had learned by race to speak last: "Swift to hear, slow to speak" (Jas. 1: 19). Going back to the time when God had chosen him in the first instance to bear the message of salvation to the Gentiles in the house of Cornelius in Caesarea, he says: "And God, which knoweth the hearts, bare them witness, giving them the Holy Ghost even as he did unto us, cleansing their hearts by faith."

Now therefore why tempt ye God, that ye should put a yoke upon the disciples which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?" It was a word from the Lord himself, and touched the very essence of the question. If the heart were cleansed by faith, why add thereto an outward sign which in itself had no power to benefit the heart?

A word from the Lord carries power with it: "then all the multitude kept silent;" when God speaks, even through his servants, it stills the spirit of man. And then he made a way for Barnabas and Paul to declare what miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them. Now the convocation ceased to be in the hands of man. God had taken the reins into his own hands and was guiding. The Judaizers must hear for themselves what work of God they, with their narrowness, were in danger of limiting. And now God had a message by another of his servants, who in a clear, God-taught way, explained the purpose of God in this dispensation. It was James, who speaking as Peter had done, in no spirit of disputation, gave an authoritative word.

In this first council at Jerusalem James declares that God offers to the Gentiles what the Jews rejected. Yet, while God called the Jews as a nation, he sought to take out from the Gentiles, not another nation, but the people gathered out of the nations for his name. Until this purpose of God is carried out, Israel cannot be restored and the world cannot be converted. But "After these things I will return and I will build again the tabernacle of David . . . that the residue of men may seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things" (Acts, 15: 16, 17). When God has the people for his name, and can take them away without dying, then things will go forward among the Jews and then among the heathen. James gave counsel that the Gentiles who were turned to God should not be troubled about circumcision, but should refrain from idolatry from things strangled and from blood.

The first pastoral letter of the church was written on this occasion and sent not only with Barnabas and Paul, but also with two of themselves, Judas and Silas to give in writing the minutes of the synod, and to state very specially the determination which had been arrived at. Anxiously the Church at Antioch waited for the return of the beloved delegates whom they had sent up to Jerusalem. As soon as they arrived, the multitude of the believers was gathered together, to whom the epistle was formally read, and they rejoiced. The cloud which had seemed to gather over the Church, the bondage which seemed to endanger them, had dispersed: no yoke had been put upon their necks but the yoke of Jesus which was easy and his burden which was light. And blessing came out of this trial: thereby God called out another missionary. Judas and Silas being prophets exhorted the brethren with many words. Judas returned to Jerusalem with the other messengers, but the work at Antioch had taken hold upon Silas, and the missionary call began to penetrate his heart, he abode there still, and with Paul, Barnabas and others spent time in teaching and preaching the Word.

The missionary vocation of Paul and Barnabas was no temporary thing; they could not forget those lands through which they had traveled as God's light-bearers. Without doubt the souls in those places lay much on the hearts of these new missionaries in prayer, but they waited for a sure indication of the mind of God before attempting to return although they had not yet learned to trust God rather than dispute. "After some days Paul said unto Barnabas, let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the Word of the Lord, and see how they do. Barnabas had no other thought; both of them knew that the time was come, but the same spirit of disputation which they had manifested both in Antioch and Jerusalem in regard to the Judaizing teachers now showed itself between these men associated by the Holy Ghost in this holy service. The question was whether Mark should accompany them who had turned back from the work (Acts 14: 13). Barnabas determined one thing, Paul thought another, and it seems that they did not leave the decision to God, but they took things into their own hand and parted from one another: Barnabas taking Mark and Paul choosing Silas. Was it this failure which God used to humble Paul and to teach him his nothingness, and make him learn what it was to be crucified with Christ (Gal. 2: 20)?

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

It is impossible to over-estimate the importance of the incident of Church history described in the lesson. It affects the life of the Christian Church of

to-day and of all time. There is an inveterate desire in the minds of a certain class of religious leaders to add something to the tests Christ ordained for his people. They want to stand at the door of the kingdom of heaven and exclude all who do not have some particular stamp, or ticket of admission. Sometimes one kind of ticket is demanded and sometimes another, but in every age it has been necessary to drive them away from the door, so that every man may enter who believes in Christ for the salvation of his soul. This chapter tells the story of the first attempt in this line and how it was defeated. Paul gives his version of it in the second chapter of the epistle to the Galatians, from which we can see how hard and bitter the struggle was, and how many of the sorrowful details Luke has decorously omitted from his narrative. The trouble began at Antioch, the scene of Paul's early labors. He had preached salvation by faith in Christ and, when the Gentiles believed, and proved by their lives the sincerity of their faith, Paul freely admitted them to the Church. They turned from sin and from superstition and, in the strength of Christ, sought to become better and holier men. They succeeded, and were rejoicing in their victory over sin and temptation, when certain Jewish Christians came from Jerusalem to pay them a visit. These visitors professed to be shocked at the idea of Gentiles expecting to enter the kingdom of God, without undergoing the rite which is the physical characteristic of the Jewish people. They told the new converts that they ought to become Jews by adoption, otherwise they had no ground to hope for salvation. Like the proselyte they must be circumcised in order to make them eligible for Christianity. They had a plausible argument for their contention. Circumcision had been in force from the time of Abraham—eighteen hundred years. Moses had insisted upon it and every Jew had seen to it that his son underwent the rite in his infancy. Christ had been circumcised and his Apostles were all circumcised men. The epithet of uncircumcised was equivalent to heathen. They could point to the Scripture in proof that God had commanded it and could challenge their opponents to show any word of Christ or his Apostles implying that it was no longer necessary. But Paul was indignant. He contended that the demand was childish. A man could become a son of Abraham better by exercising the faith of Abraham than by undergoing a rite which affected his body only. Christianity was not of rites and ceremonies but a change of heart and life. So the controversy until it was resolved to find out what the Apostles had authorized them to come down from Jerusalem and all this trouble. Paul and Barnabas, Titus, a specimen Gentile convert sent to Jerusalem to submit the question to the Apostles who had been converts of Christ and had listened to his teaching. The result of the appeal is described in the lesson. At the close of the meeting, Paul was in possession of the vote to the churches forever settling the question in favor of his contention. The head of the Jerusalem church believed to have been a brother Lord and the author of the Epistle bearing his name, had spoken in favor of Paul's contention, and Peter had concurred. The Gentiles were authorized to be circumcised, but for the sake of the churches they should be free from certain dietary laws. They must lead chaste lives, a necessary injunction because unchastity was common among the Gentiles and was not deemed necessary for the Jews. These things were all that were essential. Nothing was said about the Sabbath, Passover, or baptism, or communion. So the Church was freed from the burden of the dead faith and even the Christian who has given his life to Christ and is loving him and walking in his footsteps can defy any man to put him into bondage. When ritualists people who want to substitute some outward change of regeneration, that he must do this or that because he can be saved, he can point to this written eighteen hundred years ago, and take his stand upon it as the Charter of his liberty.

No greater burden than necessary. A change of heart often involves a change of outward things, and pain, the giving up of dear associations. These are necessary, but deluded people often have others which their teachers impose upon them unnecessarily. Mr. Spurgeon says that one of the most sorrowful moments of his life was when he saw Pilate's staircase in Rome as a people crawling up it on their knees doing other foolish penances. It is a cruel thing because useless. No gain good to his soul by self-torture of body. In India devotees suspend themselves from hooks in the flesh, or stand night with one arm extended and grows stiff and immovable. The change God is by a spiritual change which by faith and there is no other way. The rites and ceremonies and flagellation and washings fail as substitutes. alone is effectual and indispensable.

A people for his name. A people should bear his name because of their likeness to him. His sublimity of character transforms them by its mighty power. A great teacher compared the influence of a statue of a beautiful Greek girl standing in a market place, dirty, untidy peasant girl sees that when she comes to the market first time. She is struck with its beauty and gazes at it in rapt admiration says nothing, but the next week comes to the market her hair is not so dirty and uncombed but in smooth plaits fully coiled. It is clumsily done, but shows purpose and effort. She shows her hand over it as she again surveys the statue. Next week the hair is more fully coiled and—wonder of wonders—her face has been washed. Next week poor clothes are mended and she appears upon her more gracefully. The admiration of the girl is completely changed. Christian beholding the character of Christ, though only dimly as in a mirror, is changed into his likeness.

Troubled you with words. In points of ceremony will often divide the church. At one time in Scotland was a fierce controversy between the Anti-lifters. The question was whether the bread on the communion table should be handed out lifted, or whether the communicants should help themselves. This trivial question was a source of much bitterness.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

THE MARKETS OF CAIRO.

the Sights to be Seen in the Seats of Egypt's Ancient City.

CAIRO is both larger and handsomer than Alexandria and next to Constantinople itself is the most important city under Mohammedan rule. Its people are a mixture of all nationalities and its markets the most varied character. Grain, hides, and ostrich feathers come from the interior, cotton and sugar cane from Egypt, with shawls and indigo from Persia and Hindustan, and there is a miscellaneous variety of articles of European manufacture. One of the most important industries in former times was the traffic in slaves, but this has been discontinued. There are many factories for spinning, weaving, and printing, a paper-mill, a sugar-refinery, manufactures of silk goods, saltpetre, leather, and leather.

For the small vendors there is a great variety of products in which a lively trade is done. Sugar-cane, sweets, cakes, figs, and such delicacies tempt the eye of the passer-by and one enters them at every turn.

Passing through the business section of the city, one cannot help remarking the difference between the Oriental and those in our own cities. Here the large buildings that will accommodate thousands, while there the little shops are hardly large enough to hold wares and their goods. These are like so many bandboxes along the crowded streets which are made still narrower by the bay windows that jut out on the sides, and are set a little lower than the height of an average-sized person, consequently make it very disagreeable for pedestrians and donkey-riders. Blockades are the rule, and collision of frequent occurrence. On the stands may be found articles of every description—fruits, flowers, and cakes, sweetmeats and numerous trifles and curios. Behind these peering little shops, the merchants in their long gowns, with legs crossed in fashion, sipping their coffee or chatting with some customer. Our photograph shows a sugar-cane booth with girls as the saleswomen. The cane is cut to short lengths and is purchased by young folks of Cairo, with whom it is a prime favorite. Nor are the elders loath to using it in this simple form, and any student in El Ashur (the great school of nearly 10,000 pupils) carries a piece of sugar-cane while he reads passages from the Koran or teaches his lessons.

We the Beautiful.

We should, by every means in our power, strive to develop in our children's minds the love of the good and the beautiful. Childhood must have something to love, to admire, and it rests with us to direct that love aright. Besides, an education of even the simplest pleasures is a source of secret pleasure, a mental as well as spiritual development. It makes us possessors of and aware in all that the eye and the intelligence can reach and comprehend. We have a legal right to our neighbor's farm, but our eyes have an esthetic claim on the landscape, and in the currency of the soul we may get more out of it than its value. If you are an ardent lover of beautiful things are yours. Says an authentic writer: "If you reside at Denver you own the peaks of the Rocky Mountains, now bathed in sunshine, now swathed in snow, now wearing frost-formed mantles of purest white. Every flower that grows in your garden; every bird that is athwart your field of vision is a denizen of your aviary; every robin that reels off his rollicking song by the yard within the sound of your ear is your song-bird; every sunset is yours, and every rainbow, in short, you are immensely rich; you own stock in the Milky Way, and have a claim on every visible star that shines in the depths of space.

All things of beauty are not theirs alone
Who hold the fee; but unto him no less
Who can enjoy, than unto them who own,
Are sweetest uses given to possess.
For heaven is beautiful; and suffers none
To make monopoly of aught that's fair.

"Let me Sit Up a Little While."

This is a familiar child-plea, and is frequently heard as the time approaches for laces, bracelets, and tinkling anklets; the kerchief may be replaced by a cap, and around the waist a rich girdle drawn. But whatever may be worn indoors, whenever the Moorish lady takes her walks abroad, she is completely enveloped in the "haik" or the "schele," the former an adaptation of the "burnous" worn by the men, and the latter a shawl and cloak all in one, something like the Spanish mantilla. Thus clad, the ladies are not objects of grace or of beauty, for they are uncertain in their gait.

Training in Self-Denial.

Children of the present day, writes Rev. H. C. Trumbull,—especially children of parents in comfortable worldly circumstances—are far more likely than were their fathers and mothers to lack lessons of self-denial. The standard of living is very different now from a generation since. There were few parents in any community in this country fifty years ago who could buy whatever they wanted for their children; or, indeed, for themselves. There was no such freeness of purchases for children, for the table, for the house or the household, as is now common on the "sandman" to come around and sprinkle his drowsy drops on the sleepy eye-lids of the little folks. A Western poet has very prettily pictured the childish battle against sleep in these lines:

Bravely they laugh and chatter,
Just for a minute or two;
Then when they end their chatter
Sleep comes quickly to woo.
Slowly their eyes are closing,
Down again drops every head,
Three little maids are dozing,
Tho' they're not ready for bed.
That is their method ever,
Night after night they protest,
Claiming they're sleepy never,
Never in need of their rest;
Nodding and almost dreaming,
Drowsily each little head
Still is forever scheming
Meely to keep out of bed.

How Arab Women Dress.

A single garment, a pair of baggy trousers, and a kerchief for the head, are the principal parts of the costume of an Arab woman, a traveler writes. There may be much elaboration and adornment; stockings may or may not be worn, a profusion of jewelry always, such as necklaces, bracelets, and tinkling anklets; the kerchief may be replaced by a cap, and around the waist a rich girdle drawn. But whatever may be worn indoors, whenever the Moorish lady takes her walks abroad, she is completely enveloped in the "haik" or the "schele," the former an adaptation of the "burnous" worn by the men, and the latter a shawl and cloak all in one, something like the Spanish mantilla. Thus clad, the ladies are not objects of grace or of beauty, for they are uncertain in their gait.

SUNSHINE THROUGH CLOUDS.

If the world does seem dark and dreary,
Clouds appearing on thy sky,
If the tempest round thee lowers,
And the breakers hoarsely cry—
Look not on the gloomy shadows
That obscure the sun's fair light,
On the morning 'twill be shining;
All thy Father's ways are right.
Brave the heart that looketh upward,
Heeding not the tempest wild;
Brave the faith that never falters,
Trusting like a weary child.
In the morning joy availeth,
Clouds and darkness pass away—
Lo! the beauty and the sunlight
Of a blissful, cloudless day.

CHILDISH LOVE OF TOYS.

MUCH has been said by kindergartners on the subject of toys writes Katherine Beebe, in her little volume on Home Occupation for Children and those commended and recommended which can be really used by the child, such as blocks, crayons, paints, blackboards, stoves, garden tools and the like, all of which is well worthy consideration; but there is a word to be said for toys pure and simple, the tin horses, little wagons, toy animals, miniature houses and stoves and so on. Their value lies in the stimulus or start which they give to a child's imagination. With such a starting point a whole train or sequence of events connects itself, or should do so, in the child's mind, the expression of which forms the play. There are children to whom toys suggest little or nothing, to whom a tin horse is a tin horse and nothing more, and which are by them soon forgotten and discarded. There are others, however, to whom the same toys will be a beginning of a long series of imaginative plays. I once knew three such children, to one of whom was given a tiny milk wagon. At that time a new cable road was the talk of the hour, and one constructed of string, hairpins and spools was in operation across the nursery floor. A long period of happy play was broken by sounds of disagreement and I was finally called for in a tone which told me that something had gone wrong. Several cars were on the track, the little milk wagon in front of them. The owner of the car next to it had "clanged" in vain and I was greeted with "make Mollie get off the track with her milk wagon!" I rang and rang and she won't get off! Whereupon, seven-year-old Mollie looked up with a placid smile, saying, "I'm a-playing milk wagon. They never get off the track till the car drivers get mad!"

To these children the merest trifle in the way of a toy suggests any amount of play, and in their ability to use the toys so fascinatingly displayed in the shops to round-eyed, wistful-looking children. I find a suggestion of their real purpose. It may be necessary to actually teach some children to play with toys, others may need only a little help, and the normally imaginative ones need no assistance at all, only occasional guidance.

On Borrowing Trouble.

There is an old proverb which says that we conquer troubles by meeting them boldly half-way. But the child of God knows of an even better method of triumphing over the petty cases and worries of life. He simply takes them to his Father. On this subject Amos R. Wells gives these helpful suggestions:

It is treason to thy goodness, dear Father, to be anticipating evil while thou art always planning good for me. It is treason to my own powers to weaken them by fears that may be groundless. It is treason to my work to expend its energies on worry. Let me reach out my best toward the best thou hast always ready, and what harm or sorrow can befall me? I entertain care within, while thou art knocking at the door. When vexations present themselves, I run to meet them, while my servile imagination makes ready a large place for them. How do I sin against thy law of happiness? Thou canst not magnify blessings for one who thus magnifies troubles. Thou canst not bestow peace upon one who makes no war on unrest. I shall not have from thee any burden I cannot bear; I myself lay on myself the unbearable burdens. O God who alone canst transform the nature of man, change the ingenuity which I invent into a skill at discovering joys. Make strong my memory for pleasures, and weaken it for pain. Give me a genius for gratitude. Show me how far I stray from thee when I wander into grief.

A NOTABLE BI-CENTENARY.

Old Trinity Church in New York Celebrates the Two-hundredth Anniversary of its Organization—King William's Charter and Queen Anne's Royal Gift.

WITH simple ceremonies, but with reverent hearts, the bishops, clergy and laity of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New York celebrated last week the two hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the parent church of the diocese. Old Trinity Church was gay with heraldic banners and radiant with floral decorations, while crowds of distinguished visitors from all parts of the country were present day after day through the week, to participate in the celebration.

Bishops Potter, Littlejohn, Doane and Walker took part in the services and representatives of the various departments of the work of the Church described their spheres of labor. It was a marvelous showing of activity of many kinds and it was natural to look back to the humble beginning of the establishment and contrast it with its present power and influence.

New York, in those early days, was not sympathetic with the project of establishing an English Church in the city. Small in numbers and poor in pocket, the members of the Protestant Episcopal church, an insignificant body among the wealthy Dutch burghers, in 1697, undertook to build a church in which they could hold the services to which they had been accustomed in their own land and hear the liturgy that they loved. A subscription was started which resulted in the collection of "three hundred and twelve pounds, thirteen shillings and seven pence." The old record shows that it was contributed in small sums and was evidently the result of self-denial. To this amount was shortly afterwards added the sum of five pounds, twelve shillings and three pence, as a contribution from the Jews of the city. A charter having been secured from William III., King of England, steps were at once taken to erect "a church and steeple and a convenient house for the rector." Special provision was made that the steeple should contain a clock and one or more bells. The title which was given to the church by the original charter is the same which it now bears, namely, the Parish of Trinity Church. A royal grant, confirmatory of this organization, gave the corporation the ground on which the church was built, "together with a certain piece or parcel of ground adjoining thereto, being in or near to a street without the north gate of the city, commonly called and known by the name of Broadway."

A plain unpretentious edifice was built, and Dr. William Vesey was ordained in London in August, 1697, as the rector of the new parish. It was at that time a poor corporation, but afterward, in 1765, Lord Cornbury, then Governor of the Province, issued in the name of Queen Anne, a royal deed, which conveyed to it the large tract of land then known as the Queen's Farm, but there after called the Church Farm, "lying," as the deed stated "on the west side of Mamanata Island, and extending from St. Paul's Church, northwardly along the river to Skinner Road." This north boundary, known to us as Christopher Street, was at that time far out in the country, and the land south of it was largely an uncultivated tract yielding little revenue even after it became farm land. Going over the ground now, with its fine warehouses and its dense population, it seems a magnificent gift, but at that date no one foresaw to what vast value it would grow. The church did not foresee it, and yielded freely such strips as were needed for streets by the growing city and for other public purposes. Gifts were made, too, in large numbers, for religious and educational purposes. King's College, now Columbia, received a large slice. The General Theological Seminary, also, received a gift of land. Two lots were given to the city to establish a ferry; several lots for a free school, and more for the sites of three markets in Brennon Street, Duane Street and Christopher Street. Still more remarkable, as showing the broad spirit of toleration then existing, Trinity gave three city lots for the use of the senior pastors of the Presbyterian congregations of the city. Altogether, at the end of a hundred and fifty years from the date of its organization, the gifts of Trinity Church for religious, educational their philanthropic labors. This celebration is rather an occasion for congratulation than for criticism, but at a period when money is so urgently needed for the propagation of the Gospel at home and abroad, it is inevitable that the wealth of Trinity Church should by some be compared not always to its credit with the work that it is doing.

The present stately edifice standing on Broadway, at the head of Wall street, is the third which has occupied that site. The first church, erected in 1697 soon became too small for the worshippers. It was enlarged to nearly double its original size. It served its purpose until the outbreak of the Revolutionary war, when it was destroyed in the great fire. For four years it remained in ruins, the congregation worshipping meanwhile in St. Paul's Church. The second edifice was erected in 1790, and at its dedication by Bishop Provoost George Washington was present. It stood until 1839 when it needed repairs so extensive that it was deemed advisable to pull it down and build a new church. The present church was then erected and first fifty years of the church's history. At the time of his call he was a layman at Hempstead, L. I., a graduate of Harvard College, and a young man of piety. He accepted the salary of a hundred pounds a year, was added later seventy-five pounds house-rent. He was succeeded in his assistant, Rev. Henry Barclay Swete, who had been rector of the new church of St. George. That time stood in Beekman street, succeeded Dr. Barclay. In his place, Dr. Paul's Church, now the oldest church in New York, was erected. That church that Washington used as a ship, and his pew is still pointed out to visitors. Dr. Auchmuty had a large pastorate. As a Tory and a Loyalist he found himself unpopular in the some trouble that ensued with the officers owing to his insubordination in reading the prayers for the Royal Family, led to his paying a visit to New Brunswick. When the loyal rector returned to his beloved church in ruin, distress and the hardships he endured on his return to New York are said to have shortened his life, and he died soon after his successor also met with trouble, owing to lack of sympathy with the Government. In 1786, the Trinity was made Bishop of New York. This was Dr. Samuel Provoost, and after his death his successor became Bishop of New York. The offices of Rector of Trinity Church of New York were held for several years. The devotion of the parish and its work, were largely the result of the labors of Dr. Berrian, who became Rector in 1830 and held the office until his death in 1862, when Dr. Morgan Dix, the present Rector, was elected. Dr. Dix was at the time of the war, an active worker in his parish, is the author of a large number of theological works. Few know the labor that he has given to the church during the thirty-five years he served it as Rector. Other not so blessed as Trinity wives have been compelled to move from the district, while the needs of the district have been constantly increasing. It has devolved on Dr. Dix and his helpers to supply the needs among the large population of the parish.

A Cruel Explorer Pushed.

It is seldom indeed that there has been occasion to record a case of cruelty against any one engaged in scientific exploration. Such a case, however, has recently come to light, the accused being Dr. Peter Peters, the distinguished traveler and scientist, who was engaged by the German African Commission years ago and placed in charge of their work in the "Dark Continent." Dr. Peter has just been tried at a Berlin Court. He was tried on charges of ill-treating Africans and particularly with regard to hanging a negro boy in 1892; with hanging a girl in 1892; with unjustly making war upon the Malalia in November, 1891, and with furnishing incorrect reports. Peters protested that he was not and affirmed he believed he had not of life or death over all the black station, except those who were of the German colonial force. He had having undertaken extensive missions against his instructions; contended the situation was then, as an attack on the part of Warongos was feared, and he claimed was obliged to inflict the death penalty in order to save German prestige. The station-house was broken into by Peters admitted he had flogged negroes; but he denied that he executed one, explaining that he hanged for conspiracy with a native against the expedition. Dr. Peters was sentenced to dismissal from the service and to pay the costs of the and public purposes aggregated an enormous sum. Dr. Berrian, who was rector of the Church at that time, said that estimating the value of the lands which had formed the chief part of its gifts at their then market value, the total amount was considerably over two million dollars, a sum more than equal to two thirds of the balance then in Trinity's possession.

The value of the property still remaining to Trinity has been variously estimated. A conservative estimate, however, made for the New York Times, by a gentleman who has long been connected with the finances of the corporation, places it at within twenty million dollars. This large sum is of course due to the enormous value of the land it owns in the business section of the city, and to the termination of the leases it granted in its early years. It is not surprising that the churches in the lower section of the city which are working among the poor, should often wish that some portion of this great wealth could be obtained to aid them in dedicated on May 21, 1846. It was at that time incomparably the finest church building in the country. Many efforts have been made to induce the corporation to dispose of its valuable site for a stock exchange or some other business purpose, but the offers were not considered. A tender sentiment of affection and reverence guards the historic graveyards where Alexander Hamilton and other revered men and women are buried. "They have been guarded," Dr. Morgan Dix, the present Rector, said recently, "for two centuries in a spirit of love, and I hope that future generations will continue to guard them."

The Rectors of Trinity Church during the two centuries of its existence have all been men of eminent piety and scholarship. The first, after the nominal rectorship of the Bishop of London, who was appointed merely to bring the new corporation within the lines of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, was Dr. William Vesey, whose pastoral career covered nearly the

SEEKING PEACE.

Peace is to be Sought and the Price may be Paid for It and when it is Broken.

Few men would act in the presence of impending disagreements, as Abraham is described as acting in the passage associated with the Topic (Genesis 13: 5-18). Some men would have drifted until a quarrel ensued. Others would have insisted on the rights of the benefactor and have chosen the country that suited them best. Others were resolved upon. Others have appealed to arbitration. He even gave up the choice and left it to his nephew, which territory he would have. He acted so in the present day to merit the respect of his friends. He lost his reputation as a good business. People would think of him as a foolish, a man who did not stand up for his rights. Such a man never "push to the front," but he went to the top of the heap. The competition that we worship in our children, is directly to such a course of conduct as was pursued, and it did not degenerate in the man with whom he was dealing. Lot chose the country for himself. He chose the country that was well watered everywhere. He chose the desirable district for Abraham to settle in for himself. He looked after his own interest and had no sentimental about monopolizing the good of the land. If his uncle chose to be a foolish, Lot was not going to be an example. Lot's shrewdness was a sign of which Abraham was well observed in his character. He has been regarded as a sufficient example of Abraham's being careful of his own interest. Yet Abraham did not protect himself or attempt to save himself from injury. "Let there be peace," he said, "between me and thee," and to avoid strife he was pushed all for which his services had been contending. Truly a wise lack of self-assertion would have saved him to imposition in any time.

It is remarkable how this trait of the character fulfilled the injunctions of the Lord. If a man compelled another to go a mile with him, he was to go him twain; and if a man sued another and took away his coat, he was permitted to take his cloak. We were not to resist wrong that came to the children of God having the spirit of the Lord. Singularly unworldly was such teaching. Contrary to the maxims of the world and the maxims of social dealing. But it was worldly affairs that this command of concession were commanded. There were matters in which it would be sin. When it came to questions of right and wrong firmness was a virtue. Property might be secured, worldly advantages might be relinquished for the sake of peace. A concession which involves dereliction of duty was never to be practised. Imagine Paul permitting a persecutor to go unavenged, but we do not see him taking the stand he took against false teaching. Christ was who was led as a lamb to the slaughter and who did not resent the blows of a brutal soldiery, could blaze a path of concession and denounce woes on the Pharisees and scribes and Pharisees and the scourge of cords with which he scourged the traders out of the temple. No price is never inculcated. There are some things too precious to pay for. The mistake we make is not in being dignant and courageous but in standing on the wrong things. There is nothing as righteous indignation and the conflicts in which we do well to engage. When an unholy traffic is injuring the community we ought to prove our valor to the sides with those who stand for right. When temptation is assailing the weak and people are being led astray by sophistry, we have the right to rebuke the tempter and try to thwart the legal weapons. Peace, by all means, but not peace which involves the injury of ourselves or of others.

LITTLE AND MUCH.

It matters little where I was born.
Or if my parents were rich or poor;
Whether they shrank at the cold world's scorn
Or walked in the pride of wealth secure;
But whether I lived an honest man.
And held my integrity firm in my clutch,
I tell you, brother, plain as I am,
It matters much!

It matters little how long I stay
In a world of sorrow, sin and care;
Whether in youth I am called away,
Or live till my bones and pate are bare;
But whether I do the best I can
To soften the weight of adversity's touch
On the faded cheek of my fellow-man.
It matters much!

It matters little where be my grave.
Or on the land or on the sea.
By purling brook or 'neath stormy wave.
It matters little or naught to me:
But whether the angel of death comes down
And marks my brow with his loving touch
As one that shall wear the victor's crown,
It matters much!

WHEN MOTHER DIED.

WHEN mother died,
It seemed the light of my life went out;
I seemed the goodness of God to doubt,
That day seemed only evil throughout.
When mother died.

When mother died,
I thought of all my reckless life,
That pierced her heart like a keen-edged knife.
And, O, my heart was a place of strife,
When mother died.

When mother died,
She went, I know, to the blessed God;
No more in weariness should she plod,
While I deserved of the Lord the rod,
When mother died.

When mother died,
I learned my lesson in her decease;
I looked to God for my soul's release,
And at his feet I obtained sweet peace,
When mother died.

THE VISION OF THE EPHAH.

The Last Years of the Dispensation to be Years of Commercial Supremacy.

BY W. MAUDE.

IN the first six chapters of the book of the Prophet Zechariah we have a very remarkable series of highly symbolic visions. These visions are seven in number; but though this circumstance would seem to indicate that they have a mutual relation, and form a connected whole, like the seven parables in the thirteenth chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, and the seven seals, seven trumpets, and seven vials of the Apocalypse.

yet it is by no means easy to trace any such connection; while the meaning of some of the visions is obscure. One of those on which the most light seems to be procurable is the sixth of the series—the Ephah. This vision is recorded in words which the best authorities translate as follows:

"Then the angel that talked with me went forth, and said unto me, Lift up now thine eyes, and see what is going forth. And I said what is going forth? And he said, This is an ephah that goeth forth. He said moreover, This is their eye through all the earth. And behold, there was lifted up a talent of lead, and yonder was a woman sitting in the midst of the ephah. And he said, This is Wickedness: and he cast her down in the midst of the ephah, and he cast the weight of Lead (i. e. the talent weight) upon the mouth thereof. Then lifted I up mine eyes and looked, and, behold, there came forth two women, and the wind was in their wings; for they had wings like the wings of a stork; and they lifted up the ephah between the earth and the heaven. Then said I to the angel that talked with me, Whither do these bear the ephah? And he said unto me, To build it a house in the land of Shinar; and when it is ready it shall be set in its own place" (Zech. 5: 11.)

It is hardly necessary to remind the reader that the Ephah was the largest dry measure in ordinary use among the Jews, probably corresponding very nearly with our bushel, though there is much uncertainty as to its exact size and capacity. Its symbolic significance in this vision—of which it forms the most conspicuous feature—will become more apparent when we observe that in close conjunction with it a "talent of lead" is spoken of in the seventh verse, and in the following verse as "the weight of lead;" most probably a circular plate of lead which weighed a talent, that is, about 135 pounds troy. Now the talent was constantly used in the sense of a fixed weight by which gold, silver and other things were weighed and measured; and it is very significantly spoken of here in connection with the ephah, as the latter was the usual measure of capacity. The talent was the standard measure of quantity, and the weight was made of lead as the most common heavy metal, and was used in all commercial transactions. Thus the ephah, in connection with the leaden talent, affords the most natural and appropriate symbol of trade or commercial transactions in general; just as the sword symbolises war, the mitre priesthood, and the crown royalty.

Now commerce or trade—and by trade I mean the principles as well as the development of trade—is the special characteristic of these last days. There have been in the past great trading communities, imperial marts of commerce, such as Tyre, Egypt, and Babylon; but never as now did commerce attain such a vast development or its pursuits so engross the energies of the nations generally. The present age may emphatically be said to be the commercial age of the world's history, and hence, the object of the vision shown to Zechariah is to instruct respecting the character of the influence which shall be dominant over Israel, and over the nations at the closing period of their history. It reveals where the master-power shall reside, which, in the latter days, shall "go forth" with pervading influence to control the energies of the earth. And what is the symbol of this power? It is not a sceptre, nor a sword, nor a mitre, but an ephah, the symbol of Commerce.

Steve is Wanted.

BY

listen with a happy heart to all his wife's witty and pretty explanations and descriptions.

Her dressing amazed and delighted him. He could hardly bear to dash the beauty and spirits of the brilliant little woman he loved, by any reference to his father's condition. But as he was hesitating, Jessie herself introduced the subject.

"Your father is very ill indeed, Steve," she said. "Have you heard about his condition?"

"Yes. I have been home."

"Before coming to see me? I don't think that was right. I do not value your visit now."

"It was after midnight when I reached New York. I was very unhappy about mother, and I could not at that hour get a train out here. So I went home first, and I am glad I did so. I am much needed there. Alice told me you had offered to do anything you could. It was very good of you."

"Yes. I made the offer and got the coldest kind of refusal."

"They are very miserable."

"They are very proud. And I don't care a pin about their pride. I have been having a real good time. Have you enjoyed yourself, Steve?"

"A little. I missed you Jessie far more than you can believe. I shall be glad to have you home. When can you be ready?"

"Ready? What for?"

"To go home."

"Do you mean that stuffy little flat when you say 'home'?"

"We have no other home. I shall be a great deal with father. I think from what mother says I ought to be with him every hour except those hours necessary for sleep and rest. It will be such a great comfort to have you at home, Jessie. The very sight of you makes a new man of me."

"Steve, I have told you often that I hate that flat. I will go to an hotel and board, rather than go back to it. But if you must stay near your father, then your proper place is your father's house. I am sure it is big enough to spare us a couple of rooms."

Steve looked at her in gloomy amazement. But a few months ago that flat had answered her highest ambition. And he did not like the idea of an hotel. Who had put that alternative into her head? As for taking her to his father's house, he had no right to do so; yet rather than allow her to begin hotel life, he would ask his mother and Alice to agree to Jessie's demand. But these thoughts passed very reluctantly through his mind, and Jessie said sharply:

"You do not seem to have an opinion, Steve, of your own. Why don't you say something?"

"I was thinking," he answered. "I wish you would go to our own home, Jessie; for my sake, dear! At any rate go for a little while, at this hard time. Do me this great favor, darling."

"Go to that wretched little flat! In this broiling weather! No, thank you, Steve, I won't do such a thing. I wonder how you can ask me to leave this place until the season is over. When it is over I will come back to New York, but I shall live wherever you live. If your father is alive, I suppose it will be in his house. If he is dead, everything, of course, will be different. You will have, whether you like it or not, to take your proper place."

"Jessie, I have often told you that my father's death can make no difference in our income, or in our social position."

"That is the most perfect nonsense, Steve. If he has made an improper will, we must break it."

"I would rather beg my bread than attempt to break my father's will."

"If he has made no will, then we are all right."

"God help me, Jessie! Are you really speculating over my dying father? He has bought his money with his life, and surely he has a right to do, as he will, with such dear gold."

"We shall see. How do I look, Steve?"

"You are marvelous, Jessie. You are dressed like a picture. Where did you get all these beautiful things?"

"You will find out pretty soon, Steve. But I really had to dress. People even think it strange, that I wear no diamonds. Stephen Lloyd's wife and no diamonds, seems so absurd to them."

"It would be far more absurd, if you did wear diamonds. Will you go home with me to-morrow? Do Jessie!"

"I won't go back to the city, Steve, until the weather is cooler. Then you can come for me. Nearly everyone is going away in two weeks, to the mountains. I should like to go somewhere if possible; but if you wish me, I will then go back home with you."

"To our own home? Thank you, Jessie."

"No sir. I will not go back to that flat. I have made some very stylish friends here, and I simply could not ask them to call on me in such a place. Your father's house, is all right. I will go there."

"Callers there, are out of the question, Jessie. I wonder you can think of such a thing."

"I don't think of it, stupid! But my address will be there, that is sufficient, the future can grow from that. Steve, dear, I want a lot of money. I have used up all you left me, and am a good deal in debt. Gracious! I wish I had a million."

"Always money, Jessie! I wish there wasn't such a thing. The very thought of it lies on the heart like a great stone, and seals up every good and kind feeling."

"That is all right. The heart ought to be sealed up these days. When are you going back to New York?"

Mr. T. E. C. Brinly, Louisville, Ky., of the famous "Brinly Plows," was cured of a cancer of the mouth. Had been upon three times before going to them. Prof. H. McDiarmid, formerly editor of the Standard, Cincinnati, now professor of Hiram, Ohio, was cured of cancer of the face. morning. First train." "I wish me to go with you and other and Alice?" "I wish—but—but!" "What?" "I thought she went to town, she told on Steve's family. She had a hope to do, and she had thought this, and concluded that the possibility would be best taken by her. If she advanced step by step, she shrewd enough to circumvent. For by constantly assuring her that she had "rights" in the Lloyd property, she had come to reason on possession as a great privilege. She rode into town the next morning, and asked his wife concerning her. "He is in Day & Darling's," she answered with an air of triumph. "He is become a worse crank than the people, and for the fact is his motto, and much good it will do him. I think he is next door to it." "I wish we were all crazy, Jessie, great heart." "At when it goes out to the whole town, he loves so many that he loves to be lectured two weeks ago at the Union, and said things that made respectable people angry at him. I severely criticised by Mr. Belton any others, and I was ashamed to judge him as my brother." "John! Pray what did he say to Mr. Belton and many others?" "That if we saw any injustice or did not oppose it, we also were elated and actively immoral. Such a man who lived up to that to be constantly in a fight." "I thought to be in a constant fight with him. What else did he say?" "He spoke badly about what he called the sort of people, and said 'they are cowards.'" "He laughed heartily, and answered: 'It is interesting, Jessie. Why did he lie towards?'" "If they saw a wrong they shut up and took their supper and forgot it. Or if they read of some great wrong, they said: 'Poor fellow, and then the comic opera, or to dance all the house of their most respectable forgetting that because of their justice, and fraud, and cruelty to the poor and the unfortunate their pleasure.'" "I cryed, and very true words. How could people listening like them?" "The papers said John spoke in a voice of anger and pity, and set the people to the more 'worthy sort of people, the ones whose help he wanted, to fight with him. John is a fool. If he had his fine talents to politics, Mr. Belton, there is no office he might get to—Governor, President, what has the rabble at his heels?" "It is the rabble that make Government Presidents who would be a disgrace to our making, Jessie?" "I would be very nice to have a brother of the United States, no matter how poor or what made him so. Here we were in third street. You may leave now or I have a great many little things to do." "He left his wife at one of the great stores, and went to watch in his room. Jessie was happier than she had been. She had discovered that after all the dominant key in her husband's life and that allowing for a certain opposition she would be very much in the long run, to get her own way. She was determined about it, and she determined never to go back on her life she had left. She had gradually throwing off the claims of her mother, brother and sister; all of which was gold. It might be the price of soul, it might be the price of domestic happiness, of honor and wealth—but she wanted gold—gold to be before the front of a crowd of men and women; gold to outdress and outdance the multitude of flatterers; gold to buy luxury and flattery; gold that was to be absolutely upon her own indulgence, and to be a single charitable gift. She knew her desire and her intention, and he trembled, because he doubted his own ability to resist the entreaties, the smiles and tears and cleverly-sustained pressure that would be brought against him. He had the faculty, however, of letting things drift, and this question of the future was not yet to decide. But he felt certain that as soon as she wished to do so, Jessie would accomplish the desire of her heart and make herself one of the Lloyd household. So the thing expected happened, and Mrs. Lloyd and Alice, with the supersensitiveness of good women, rather overdid the concession granted. They were so afraid of not being courteous enough that they resigned somewhat of their own rights, and so conscious of their own dislike to the intrusion, that they covered it with more than an ample ceremony. The best guest rooms in the house were allotted to Jessie: a carriage was placed at her disposal, and the servants were instructed to give her every attention, and obedience.

Children and Fear of the Dark.

N Robert Louis Stevenson's wonderful collection of poems, entitled: "A Child's Garden of Verse," he has one which is called "Shadow March." It is so picturesque that I am tempted to quote it for you, I am sure you will like it:

All round the house is the jet-black night:
It stares through the window-pane;
It crawls in the corners, hiding from the light,
And it moves with the moving flame.

Now my little heart goes a-beating like a drum,
With the breath of the Bogie in my hair;
And all round the candle the crooked shadows come
And go marching along up the stair.

The shadow of the balusters, the shadow of the lamp,
The shadow of the child that goes to bed—
All the wicked shadows coming, tramp, tramp, tramp,
With the black night overhead.

I often wonder when I see grown people compelling little children to stay alone in the dark whether they are ever afraid of the dark themselves—not whether they were afraid of it when they were children, which is another matter. Most grown-up people have left their childhood so far behind them that it is practically the same in their lack of sympathy as though they had never been children at all. So the question I wish to ask is whether my grown up readers have the least conception of what it is to be afraid of the dark, now in their mature age.

One summer night a few years ago I was spending some weeks in the country, and ventured out to a church meeting one moonless night in company with a friend. We were both city-bred women accustomed to lighted streets, and we never gave a thought to the fact that when we should come out of the door of that little lamp-lit chapel we would step into a region mysterious, dim and utterly unknown, in which we could not easily find our way back to safety. I shall never forget that stepping from the door, the last lantern going down the road away from us, and the absolute opacity of shadow which instantly fell all around about us like a cloak. We did not dare to move. It was a night almost without stars, and we could not tell whether if we stepped ahead we should step on the safe path or from its side into a ditch; and in point of fact it took us nearly an hour to get back to the safety of the hotel through the black road, down which we went inch by inch until the welcome lights were seen.

I have never forgotten that experience of the enfolded gloom of the night, and of the uncertainty with which it invested our progress; and though neither of us felt afraid that supernatural shapes would start from it, or highwaymen attack us on our way, it was still desolate enough. I have known something of the terror which I am sure pervades the minds of little children when they are confronted with that which is to them so strange and full of queer possibilities. Sometimes I have wakened in the dead of night in my own room and felt for a moment a sense of distress, and almost terror, which it has taken all my reasoning powers to dismiss. And yet I am not naturally a timid person, nor one given to easy fright.

It would be very easy to place a shaded lamp somewhere where the light would not fall on the child's eyes, or to leave open the door into a hall which should be lighted, while the mother could cheerfully say, "You are perfectly safe, dear child, for I am near you and can come to you at a moment's call." I heard of a little girl some time ago who was told by her mother that the angels were watching over her while she was in the dark, and that she therefore need not be afraid. "But," she said, "dear mamma, you may tell the angels to stay away; I do not care to have any sky folks here." The truth is that most children would feel more comfortable and happy with the knowledge of the dear father or mother near at hand than with any other consolation which could be offered them.

One of the crimes against childhood which we find it very hard to forgive is the frightening a child by way of punishment. True, intelligent Christian parents would hardly do this, but nurses and others who are less conscientious do not scruple to invoke terror as a penalty for a child's wrong-doing. It would be possible, I think, to omit this entirely from the childish mind, if it could always be surrounded by kind, wise, and judicious people. The mother who shuts a little child into a dark closet, or who in any way invokes the aid of darkness to bolster up her authority, is doing a very foolish and ill-judged thing. We have so much need as we go through life of strength of nerves, strength of mind, calmness and quiet, that from the very first it would be well if we could suffer no loss of our reserves in these directions. Of course, as we grow older, we summon will and resolution to our aid and overcome our timidity; but within a day or two, I have heard a lady confess that she never goes up-stairs to her room, even when halls are lighted, without a shudder at passing closed doors, and this dates back to some early period when she was too young to have learned self-control.

What is needed most for all is to cultivate a habit of going bravely forward in whatever we have to do, never inviting peril, but if we must face it, facing it quietly and without complaint. But as there is no especial advantage to be gained by suffering from a surgical operation when one can just as well have the pain quieted by an anaesthetic, so there is no honor that I can see in staying needlessly in the dark if you do not like it. A little trouble taken to remove from the mind of a child any cause for fear may save many a child from fear of the dark when the years of maturity have come; at all events, it would make childhood a happier time.

And for childhood and age alike, there is wisdom in saying reverently the evening prayer:

Now I lay me down to sleep
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take,
And this I ask for Jesus' sake.

There are those to whom he giveth songs in the night!

Dear Sirs:—An old friend handed me a couple of small vials of Tartaralithine some time ago and tried on myself, having suffered from Rheumatism for several years. SAPOLIO

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, DD.

The Apostle to the Red Men.

BUYLER says that Bishop Westcott of Durham, England, once said to Miss Smiley, "the most man I ever met is your Bishop." There are a good many of us here that that Englishman is a type of an apostle. Bishop Whipple been the life-long friend of the Indian. At the first missionary which he attended after his coming as a bishop, one of the older said to him: "You are to speak tonight, say anything about Indian—they are a failure. You are a bishop and cannot afford to be an enthusiast."

That conservative bishop knew the character of the man with whom he was speaking. When Bishop Whipple spoke he took the audience into confidence and frankly repeated the facts that had been given him, and taking his text he proceeded to deliver a heart-felt appeal for sending more good bishops always has the courage of his convictions, in whatever circle he is found.

Whipple never tires of telling of the Indians, among whom he has labored so long. Once, when he had distinguished visitors at one of his Indian reservations, he prepared a pantomime entertainment of the bishop's friends. The chief Wah-ah-boued him: "Does your English know the history of the Ojibwas? Do you like to hear it?"

Receiving an affirmative answer, he said: "Before the white man came, the lakes and prairies were full of game, and the rivers were full of fish, and the Great Spirit's gift to man. I will show you some of the things as they were before the white man came."

For the house opened and out came an Indian, dressed in skins and ornaments with colored porcupine quills, and by his side an Indian woman in a neat dress of skins trimmed with fur. The chief said: "My father, you see the Indians such as they were before the white man came. Shall I tell you what the white man did for us? He said 'you have no houses, no fire-horses, no fire-canoes, no books, no implements of toil, give us your land and we will make your people as the white man.' The white man had a forked tongue. I will show you what he gave us."

Then came out a man with face smeared with mud, in a ragged blanket, without leggings and by his side an Indian woman in a tattered calico dress. The Chief cried: "O God, is this an Indian? How came it?"

The Indian took out from under his blanket a black bottle and said "Iskotowabo (fire-water) the white man gave it to us."

The Chief then said: "Many moons ago a pale white man came to see us. We hated white men, and would not listen. But each year when the sun was so high we knew we should see that white man coming through the pines. We called a council. We asked: 'Why does he come? He does not trade. He asks nothing from us, perhaps the Great Spirit sent him.' We did listen and took that story to our hearts. Shall I tell you what it has done for us?"

Then came out of the house an Indian in a black frock coat, and by his side an Indian woman in a black alpaca dress. The Chief said: "My friends, there is the only religion in the world that can lift a man out of the mire and tell him to call the Great Spirit his father."

A sceptical traveler who was present grasped Bishop Whipple by the hand and exclaimed: "All the arguments I have read in defense of Christianity are not equal to what I have seen to-day."

There comes that tired, weary feeling, lack of energy, weakness, dullness and all run down sensations, etc., which seem almost unaccountable. The true cause of such troubles is due to the inactivity of the nerve centers of the brain which supply the nerve fluid or life force to every part of the body. When these small but all-important organs become deranged, the supply of nerve fluid is insufficient to meet the demand, and consequently the whole system is affected.

Dr. Miles' Nervine is a remedy for all diseases of the nerves. It acts directly upon the nerves, invigorates, strengthens, and creates new life and vigor throughout the entire body, and thus it restores health.

All druggists guarantee first bottle benefits or money refunded. Book free. Address, DR. MILES MEDICAL CO., Elkhart, Ind.

LIET COLD, IF NEGLECTED, OFTEN ATTACKS THE LUNGS. "Brown's Bronchial Troches" give immediate and effectual relief.

THE LUNGS AND THE DISEASES WHICH AFFECT OUR BREATHING.

Scientific Facts of Vital Interest to Everybody.

Forty out of every hundred people who die of disease lose their lives by some form of throat or lung complaint.

This frightful sacrifice of precious human life before the middle of its average duration is reached is wholly unnecessary and results from ignorance, neglect and malpractice.

Throat and lung diseases constitute such a small part of the whole sickness that they could not possibly cause FORTY PER CENT. of the gross mortality were they rightly understood by general physicians.

It is because their usual treatment is not governed by those principles which have become axioms of medical science in the successful treatment of inflamed and ulcerated organs in other parts of the body.

It is because all their early and most curable stages are wholly wasted in vain attempts to reach the lungs through the stomach and general system, instead of attacking the disease in the lungs while it is yet mild and could be easily removed by direct medication.

MEDICAL SCIENCE REQUIRES THE DIRECT APPLICATION OF REMEDIES TO ALL INFLAMED, ULCERATED AND GERM INFECTED PARTS, and no cure can result without it.

All throat and lung complaints begin and have their seat in the lining membranes of the tubes, air passages and cells of the throat and lungs. They are purely local diseases, and can only be removed by the DIRECT APPLICATION OF HEALING REMEDIES TO THE INTERNAL SURFACES OF THOSE ORGANS.

By inhaling medicines in a volatile state we carry them through every air passage, tube and cell of the breathing organs, and produce a direct healing action on the very seat of all lung cases. If the physician knows what to inhale and has experience in its strength and proper adaptation to the various stages and forms of lung diseases his patient has a fair chance of cure—but without local treatment and the knowledge to rightly apply it, no chance whatever.

INHALATION IS THE ONLY WAY THESE DISEASES EVER HAVE BEEN OR CAN POSSIBLY BE REACHED, their seat being in the internal lining of the breathing organs, which can only be reached by medicated air, gas or the most delicate vapors. If we do not treat them by medicated inhalations, we DO NOT TREAT THE DISEASED PARTS AT ALL, and cannot possibly expect to restore them to health.

Inhalation is, therefore, the only common sense treatment for any form of Bronchitis or Pulmonary Disease and the only possible means of bringing specific germicides to act upon and expel the germs of consumption from the lungs.

In the light of our present knowledge of these diseases, to treat Bronchitis, Asthma and Pulmonary Catarrh through the stomach is to conduct them by the most direct road into consumption. Whoever misleads the people into believing they can be cured by such treatment deceives them to their own death and ought to be held criminally answerable.

It medicating the general system would cure local diseases, why do physicians all over the world insist on the necessity of local treatment for the eye, the ear, the womb, and every other organ that can be reached by local remedies? It is because they know they could not cure them in any other way. If they could, their present treatment of all female diseases would be an outrage against modesty and decency. Nothing justifies it but the necessity of applying remedies directly to all inflamed or ulcerated parts, whether it be the womb, the eye or the lungs.

I often wonder why those doctors who delude their patients having Bronchitis and other lung complaints into trusting their stomach medication and hypodermic nostrums do not try to cure the itch by putting sulphur ointment into the stomach, or wrestle with ascariasis in the bowels by hypodermic injections of verminicide? Sulphur and verminicide are certain remedies for these diseases when locally applied, but would not cure in any other way.

Colds, Grippe and Congestion of the Lungs are the starting points from which all cases of Bronchitis, Pneumonia and Asthma begin, and THE FAILURE of all general treatment by the stomach TO CURE THESE IS THE REAL CAUSE OF CONSUMPTION.

I have before me the records of over 5,000 cases of lung disease, which have come under my care during the past six years. Ninety-seven per cent. of them date the beginning of their lung sickness to attacks of cold or grippe, which resulted in congestion of the lungs and left a soreness of the chest, or an irritation of the throat or some cough which they did not at the time think serious, but through bad treatment and neglect it went on and brought them to consumption.

Every case of Cold, Grippe, Inflammation or Congestion of the lining of the air passages endangers your life by consumption if you neglect it, but can be easily and quickly cured only by local treatment by inhalation.

Bronchial, Asthmatic or Pneumonic diseases in which such attacks result before Consumption begins, are all easily and quickly cured by this treatment. Were they all so treated and cured, or prevented, the thousands of precious lives now being sacrificed by that disease would be saved.

These are plain truths, proved by statistics and the history of the origin and development of Consumption in thousands of cases.

Ask those of your friends who are afflicted, and in almost every instance they will not only tell you of the cold, grippe, congestion or bronchial attack in which their diseases began, but how they were deceived and misled into thinking it only a slight bronchial affection, which would soon get well, until they were in the grasp of Consumption—that the failure to obtain help for the mild and curable conditions by stomach treatment brought them to their present state and left them to struggle for life against the germs of tuberculosis.

If such facts do not teach people the folly of treating lung complaints through the stomach, nothing that can be said will save them from the sufferings and death they willfully bring upon themselves.

Another delusion which people have been taught to believe is that they can run away from lung diseases by going South or North, East or West, as the case may be. In cold weather they are sent down to the humid and malarious atmosphere among the swamps and lagoons of Florida, which the hotel keepers, railway circulars and local doctors tell them is the very thing they need! The result is, they come back worse than they went, with their disease more firmly seated.

In warm weather they are told to go to high mountainous regions, where the air is so thin and poor that their feeble hearts and inflamed lungs are strained beyond their strength and generally made worse instead of better.

If it were right to send them to the seashore in the South, it cannot be right to send them two or three thousand feet above the sea level in the North.

The truth is, no known climate or elevation in the world will cure consumption. It is as common among the natives in the Adirondacks, in Colorado and in the South as in any other parts of the country.

I have at this time among my patients many who went as miners to Colorado in strong health, contracted the disease there and now appeal to me for local treatment to save them in that climate.

The same thing is true of California. I have scores of patients in all the southern counties of that State who contracted the disease there, and now look to me to save them by medicated air inhalations.

The best place for the curative treatment of weak and diseased lungs is where the air is dense, rich and pure, just far enough from the seacoast to escape its humid atmosphere, chilling winds and oppressive fogs, and dry enough to avoid all chance of malaria. A hundred feet above the sea level and twenty miles from the coast is of all others the best. Anything above a hundred feet elevation is an evil rather than a benefit, and the evil is made greater by every additional foot of elevation.

The fad of sending patients with weak and sore lungs to the Adirondacks, Catskills and Colorado shows a lack of knowledge of the physiology of the lungs and of the requirements of the disease. High altitudes increase the danger of hemorrhage, lower the nutrition of the body, prevent the proper purification of the blood, and expose them to the constant peril of death by heart failure.

THESE ARE FOUR SCIENTIFIC FACTS WHICH EVERY LUNG SPECIALIST KNOWS AND EVERY INTELLIGENT PHYSICIAN OUGHT TO KNOW. To disregard them is to send thousands every year to untimely graves.

The coast lines of New England and the damp, malarious shores of Long Island are particularly objectionable for all who are predisposed to lung complaints.

THE GRANT MAUSOLEUM.

How the River Looked on Dedication Day—The Marine Display—An Explanation.

OUR photographer, in the illustration on this page, has caught something of the spirit of the great demonstration which stirred New York on April 27. The vast crowds that assembled at Riverside Park to witness the parade and the dedication ceremonies, and the spirited marching past of the troops, made a splendid display. On the Hudson River, the spectacle also was a noble one. There lay the North Atlantic Squadron and the foreign war-ships all gayly dressed and with streamers flying, and there were also a number of revenue cutters, light-house steamers, big transatlantic liners, merchantmen, and craft of all sorts, lining the river for miles. Our photograph shows several of the naval vessels. Admiral Bunce's flagship, New York, led the naval parade. The Admiral sent 1,500 marines and blue-jackets to march in the land parade, so the sailor-boys took part in both demonstrations.

Our readers have already been informed of the programme of the celebration, which was published quite fully in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 28. That account was prepared in accordance with the stated official programme, as announced in advance and widely circulated. The programme was duly carried out in every detail, on the 27th. Our day of publication was one day after the dedication, but the account should have represented the dedication as a fixed event instead of as one already accomplished. This explanation is due to our readers.

THE PATH OF THE JUST.

Increase, progress and development are the watchwords of spiritual, as they are of material life. When the tree does not grow, nor put forth leaves, nor bear fruit, we know that it is dead.

Dearly as we love our children and delight in their pretty, childish ways, it would give us a bitter pang to see them remain children. We look for an increase of mental power, and growth of their physical frame. So it is with the characteristic of our topic, as it is described in the text (Prov. 4: 18): "The path of the just is as the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." The divine nature in the man is a spark of the ineffable light, as the light of the candle is of the same nature as the sun. It may be small; its illumination may be weak, so that it barely lights the home, but if it is the true light it will increase and give forth more light. But it is like the candle in a lantern, which may fail of its purpose if the glass around it be dull or dirty. If the body be pampered and indulged, it will grow so thick and obtuse that it will obstruct the rays, and the world will be defrauded of the precious light which God himself kindled. Again, it may be a lamp so fed by the oil of divine grace that it shall burn steadily and clearly, but will fail and go out if the oil be not constantly renewed. But it is more than either of these, for it is a living flame, with the properties of life, taking on more brightness from day to day, and spreading in ever widening circles the area that it illumines. The path of the just is upward, every step a step nearer to the parent source of light which it reflects. Thus the world receives its light, getting more of it as the medium rises and receives more of heaven's illumination, until at the zenith, the perfect day bursts upon the sight.

THAT OFFER OF Ten Yards of Dress Goods and Pattern to Cut It By, Express Prepaid,

for $2.00

Still holds, and will remain good until June 30th.

A large mill owner had manufactured a larger quantity of Silk Stripe Zephyrs for this season's demand than he could sell through the regular channels of trade. I approached him with an offer for the entire lot, and to my surprise he accepted it. It is, therefore, possible for me to offer a dress pattern of this elegant material, express paid, with a pattern and full directions for making, for the astonishingly low price of $2.00.

Your knowledge of patterns will show you that the standard patterns which are sold the country over would cost you, for a suit, anywhere, from 50 cents to $1. It is, therefore, a very easy matter to see that at the price I offer, the buyer is getting what would ordinarily cost $4, or $4.50 for $2.

In order to facilitate your choice of patterns I will be glad to send samples of goods and pictures of paper patterns for your inspection and selection for 10 cents in stamps. If you purchase from these samples the 10 cents paid will be credited on the purchase, and you need send but $1.90 in ordering.

The fact that this advertisement is received time after time by this publication is a guarantee that I have done as I agreed to do with those who have already accepted this offer. References will be sent with samples; so act promptly and send for samples at once.

I have had splendid result from your truss in quite a number of cases of grown people.

Thank you, N. C. July 21, 1895.

Free.—A Wonderful Shrub.—Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

New evidence shows that Alkavis, the new botanical product of the Kava-Kava Shrub is indeed a true specific cure for diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood or by disorders of the Kidneys and urinary organs. A remarkable case is that of Rev. A. C. Dunning, of North Constantia, N. Y., as told in the New York Herald of recent date. He was cured by Alkavis, after, as he says himself, he had lost faith in man and medicine and was preparing to die. Similar testimony of extraordinary cures of Kidney and bladder diseases of long standing comes from many other sufferers, and 12,000 hospital cases have been recorded in 7 days. Up to this time the Church Kidney Cure Co., No. 48 Fifth Avenue, New York, are the only importers of Alkavis, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of a testimonial they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepared by mail to every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disease, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all our friends to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. To prove its wonderful curative power, it is sent to you entirely free.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

A. W. Allentown, Pa. 1. What is the scriptural significance of purple? 2. Why was Esau called a hairy man? 3. What were the nations descending from Esau and Jacob called?

1. Royalty and majesty (see Judges, 8:26; Esther, 8:15, etc.) 2. There is some doubt on the subject, but the general impression is that his skin was covered with fine hair, denoting the preponderance of the animal in his constitution. This explanation is confirmed by the device used (Gen. 27:16, 23) to deceive Isaac. 3. Edom from Esau and Israel from Jacob.

J. O. Pomona, Cal. 1. How many kinds of baptism are mentioned in the Bible? 2. Does the expression one baptism (Eph. 4:5) refer to water baptism? 3. Into how many languages has the Bible been translated?

1. Three are prominent: The baptism of suffering (see Mark, 10:38); the baptism of water, and the baptism of the Holy Spirit (see John, 1:33). 2. Many contend that it does not. The Society of Friends especially hold that view. The context, however, appears to us to convey the idea of water baptism. 3. While portions of the Bible have been translated into nearly four hundred languages and dialects, the whole Bible has been translated into one hundred and seven.

P. M. Barrow, Ringtown, Pa. 1. Would like to know why Good Friday and Easter are changed two or three weeks every year? I cannot understand it.

They follow the Jewish ecclesiastical year, Christ having been crucified at the Feast of Passover. As the Jewish year was based on lunar time, the date of the Passover was fixed by the phases of the moon, as it still is. If you turn to the law of the institution as it is given in Exodus and Leviticus, you will see that it was to be held from the fifteenth to the twenty-second day of the first month. This brings the celebration to the first full moon after the spring equinox. It was desired to keep the celebration of Easter coincident with the Passover, and this could be done only by following the Jewish system of lunar months.

Sub'r. Deer Isle, Me. A Christian lady is much distressed by the fear that she may fail in the performance of a duty for which she feels herself unequal. Is there any way of getting peace?

Only by faith. God promises grace to those who need it and ask him for it. She may be sure that it is still true as it was in St. Paul's case: "My grace is sufficient for thee." If the duty comes upon her she must seek God's help and do her utmost to fulfil the duty. God does not require from any one more than he or she is able to do.

D. S. W. Homer, N. Y. How can Christ be God, when we are taught that there is only one God? Can you give a simple explanation of the Trinity?

A simple explanation is impossible, because it is a mystery beyond human comprehension. We accept it by faith. There are many things in life that we believe that we cannot explain; man himself is a trinity in unity. The body, mind and soul are entities which combined make the man, but we cannot define intelligently the limits of each. We believe that Christ was the Godhead in human form. That he took upon himself the shape of a man and became man in order to manifest to us the divinity we could realize in no other way. The Holy Spirit is a person emanating from the Father in the Son, influencing and converting and guiding and in purifying men. God is so far above the universe that we should not be surprised at not being able to understand his being. The Trinity is a revelation to be reverently accepted as a mystery beyond the human intellect to grasp.

Subscriber, Minneapolis, Minn. Am I not right in staying away from a church the pastor of which is a Republican in politics when as I believe, he ought to be a Prohibitionist?

If you stay away from that church you should go to some other; you should not give up church attendance altogether. Perhaps there is some Prohibitionist pastor whose ministry you could attend. If your present pastor preaches Christ and not politics we do not see why you should leave the church at all. Probably he is a total abstainer and therefore agrees with you in principle and differs from you only as to the best way of promoting temperance. He has a right to his own opinion on that subject and if he does not bring it into the pulpit, but contents himself with preaching the Gospel, you may profit under his ministry, though you do not agree with him in politics.

R. G., Hyde Park, Vt. 1. Is it wrong for members of one church to go to another? 2. What course should be pursued when the President of a Christian Endeavor Society is accustomed to drink to excess?

1. There is nothing wrong in occasionally attending another church. But if the attendance is frequent, it would be better to transfer the membership. The minister has a right to expect regular attendance from his members. 2. Tell him tenderly and affectionately of his failing, help him in all ways to overcome it.

calling, the locality in which the person lived, &c. In England, and very generally in Europe, surnames began to be used as family names between 1050 and 1250. They were not widely used in Bible times, although there are evidences in the Scriptures, of their occasional application; thus, the names to which Bar (meaning "son") was prefixed (during the Roman occupation) were distinct surnames. Egyptians, Phoenicians, Babylonians, and other Oriental nations also used surnames or their equivalent.

Miss Frances E. Willard, the eminent President of the W. C. T. U., and who is foremost in every great philanthropic work, has given her most cordial approval to the India Famine Relief movement and commended it to the women of America. Writing to Miss Leitch, the Indian Missionary, a few days ago, Miss Willard said: "I am proud of the record THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is making. It shows what a man of unbounded energy and resource, like Dr. Klopsch, can do to help a cause."

Puzzled Reader, Jonesboro, Tenn. As the year 1900 is divisible by four without remainder, which is the accepted test of leap year, why is it not a leap year?

The extra day once every four years is added to make our year accord with the solar year; but it is a little too much to add, so once in a century the day is not added in the fourth year, and by common consent the omission is made in the even hundredth year. So eight years elapse in this instance between one leap year and the next. So it will be in the year 2000, if the world lasts so long.

Friend, Milton Junction, Wis. If, as I believe, the Holy Spirit is an influence, is it not a violation of the Decalogue to liken him to a person?

The terms in which Christ speaks of the Holy Spirit (John 16: 7-14), show that the a vessel of corn to India? Could not Christian Endeavorers send another, and children of the schools another, thus interesting all in common cause? What must be done to start concerted movement on the part of school organizations? THE CHRISTIAN HERALD done nobly. Let others help, and glad hearts of missionaries whose hearts are broken.

Sunday Schools, churches and churches are doing splendid Christian service in India now. We believe, from present indications, that the finished result will surprise expectations.

Reader, Aurora, Neb. 1. How, when and the best way to determine a person's life, so it will be of most use to God? 2. Would be necessary qualifications for a medical course omitted? 3. Do you think necessary for a person to have more average memory? 4. Do you think for associate members of V. P. C. U. dances and other places of worldly merriment?

1. It depends upon predilection, adaptability and opportunity. 2. General education, thorough medical training, including hospital practice, a love of the profession itself, and a hopeful, sympathetic, and a helpful, sympathetic, a poor memory would be a handicap. 3. No.

Reader, Albany, N. Y. Our Sunday School recently stated that if every Christian were to become instrumental in converting one non-Christian a year, the world would soon be won for Christ. Basis exists for such a statement?

It is a simple question of figures, believe was first suggested by Rev. S. Hall, who made the calculation thus: suppose the number of Christians to be 1,000, and suppose that each led one of the Christ every year, in eleven years there would be 1,000,000 Christians, excluding infants, and the kingdom of Christ would have come to the world.

Reader, Spencerport, N. Y. You believe that every man is born under a certain planet which influences his lives, and is it wrong to consult an astrologer?

Astrology, necromancy, phrenology, and other such sciences belong to the category of pseudo-sciences. They are nowhere recognized as true sciences. They are usually resorted to by latents, impostors, and bugs, who prey upon the credulity of simple people. Besides, all searching future by means of gists, sorcerers, wizards, diviners is denounced as sinful. See Jer. 14:14; Ezekiel 13:21, 22; Lev. 19:34. Almost all the sciences practiced as such are a scientific pursuit only.

A NEGRO SCHOOL AT TALLAHATTA, INDIAN TERRITORY.

The education of the American Negro, like that of the Red man, is a problem seemingly in a fair way of solution. The school at Tallahatta is a type of other institutions of like character in the South and Southwest. The Creek government has appropriated $1,000 annually for the support of the school.

and if he persists, elect a new President as speedily as possible. For method of discipline ask the United Society, 646 Washington st., Boston, Mass.

L. R., Burlington, Wis. Is it right in view of the prohibition in Acts 15:20 for Christians to eat the meat of an animal which has been strangled?

We infer that the prohibition was made in view of the fact that the new Gentile converts would be brought into contact with Jewish Christians. The council was anxious that there should be no offence given, and that the Jewish and Gentile Christians should live in harmony. As the eating of things strangled was particularly offensive to the Jews the Gentile Christians were required to abstain. The remark of James that Moses still had those who preached him, implies that the prohibition was enacted to prevent dissension arising. As there is no longer that reason for it, we believe that the prohibition does not bind Christians in the present day.

S. A. K., Plymouth, Ill. When and how did surnames originate? We do not find them in the Bible.

The surname or addition, to the baptismal name, was a necessity, to make the name more specific and to avoid confusion, and its origin goes back to a very early period. As population increased at different centres, it became necessary to adopt additional appellations to distinguish persons from each other. So surnames were added. Sometimes the surname was based on some physical or mental peculiarity, descent, the complexion, the trade or

Holy Spirit is a person. Again in the Acts (13: 2) he is spoken of as commanding and directing. How can such an expression as "He shall not speak of himself" be used intelligibly of an influence?

W. E. B., Girardville, Pa. 1. Who was the first modern missionary? 2. Who was the first American missionary?

1. The phrase "first modern missionary" is rather vague, but it may be taken to mean the period beginning with the century. In this view, Wm Carey (1793-1834) may be regarded as the leader. His field was India. 2. Adoniram Judson (1812-1850), whose field was Burmah. Prior to this, the Moravians, (as early as 1732), had already displayed wonderful activity in missions, especially in the West Indies, North and South America, Ceylon, Africa, Egypt, Persia and India, and are really entitled to be regarded as the pioneers.

E. G. E., Rome, N. Y. Where were Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob and Leah buried? Who bought their burying-place?

They were buried in Machpelah, the cave which Abraham bought of Ephron, the Hittite at Hebron for a family sepulchre. (See Gen. 23: 9.)

THE FLOOD NEAR ALDERSON'S LANDING, ARK.

THE "WELCOME" HOME AGAIN.

Relief Expedition on the Mississippi Finishes its Labors — Thousands Assisted — Residents of the Homeward Voyage — Completion of a Timely Work of Mercy.

The Welcome has returned to her dock at Memphis, and the active work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief mission has been concluded, for the at least. The main object of this mission was to carry immediate aid to those who were temporarily in distress—to them with the necessities of life aid voted by Congress could be of little use to them. How thoroughly this has

down the Mississippi and back again to Memphis, her starting-point, made between 75 and 100 stops at different places to distribute relief. Her shrill Welcome whistle was heard and answered by scores of skiffs and dug-outs. Where there was a regular landing, many crowds of from a dozen to nearly a hundred persons, white and black. The amount of supplies given out at each point by Mr. George A. Seaman, in charge of the expedition, was a boat-load of provisions for half a dozen families; the largest was a quantity weighing one thousand pounds, which was given to some 90 persons—children and all—until the government relief arrived. The relief given by the Welcome was entirely temporary in character, but as made to reach all who were in the region visited, and it is certain that deserving cases were neglected. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S work was kind word of Christian greeting to the sufferers was not neglected. All the way back, and until within 12 miles south of Memphis, the distribution continued, the relieving party being everywhere greeted by new and eager faces. When Fritz's Landing was reached (the last stopping place on the return journey before coming to Memphis), the travelers were most cordially received by Mr. Fritz, who is a staunch Christian and Superintendent of the Liberty Church Sunday School. It was about dusk, and after the steamer had tied up, the party went to the house over a pontoon bridge (the place being surrounded by water), and a most enjoyable service was held in the sitting-room. Rev. Mr. Rife officiating, and Mr. Fritz's wife and son furnishing music for the hymns. As the sound of the voices in praise and thankfulness floated out over the wide, silent river, it seemed a fitting conclusion to the work that had been accomplished.

To recount the many pathetic incidents of the trip would fill a volume. Everywhere the same tale of want and privation was encountered: everywhere the same expressions of gratitude were heard as the Welcome sped onward on her errand of mercy. In many localities boats and oarsmen placed themselves at Mr. Seaman's disposal to carry food to the needy in remote sections, and the proffered aid was not refused.

The central picture on this page was taken in the gray dawn of a perfect morning at night, and before five o'clock in the morning the dug-outs began to draw up beside the Welcome, some coming from points not less than three or four miles distant. At seven o'clock when the tug proceeded on her voyage, over seventy people had been furnished with a week's supply of wholesome food. Over half a ton of provisions was distributed here. The illustration at the head of the next column shows the Welcome's skiff cutting its way through the trees above Pushmataha, Miss., in search of refugees in the interior.

The necessity for aid is not by any means past. The floods are subsiding, it is true, but slowly. There are wrecked homes which it will take time to rebuild, desolated plantations which it will require long labor to place in their former condition; live stock has been drowned, provisions swept away, and wreck and disaster are seen everywhere. There is still ample opportunity for the charitable to exercise their generosity and Christian spirit by forwarding supplies and clothing to the flooded districts. The National Government relief is doubtless being well and conscientiously distributed; but in the vast territory in which the flood has done its work, it is impossible to reach all the sufferers. Many are miles from any large town, in places inaccessible except by dug-outs and rowboats, and these people will be in need for a long time to come.

Guards still watch the levees along the

DUG-OUTS AT AVENUE, ARK.

Avenue, Ark. The Welcome had reached this point at sunset and tied up to a tree for the night. Soon after blowing her hailing whistle, as was the custom, to proclaim that help was near, five dug-outs came up through trees in answer to the call. Their occupants were given supplies and told to spread the news among the needy in their submerged homes, back among the trees, as well as to a large camp of refugees who had made a temporary home about two miles inland on the levee. The glad tidings spread rapidly during the lower Mississippi, and although all the breaks recently reported have been repaired, the greatest care is taken to prevent steamers injuring the weakened banks with their wash. In several instances the guards have fired upon steamers that were running at too high speed, and too near the bank. At nearly all points the outlook is now reported to be more hopeful, and even those who have sustained heavy losses are beginning to take fresh courage.

The following voluntary contributions for the Mississippi flood sufferers have A Pious Moslem Bey.

An American missionary at Harpoot, Rev. Dr. Gates, in a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, relates the following interesting incident of the relief work in Armenia:

"From Palu I went to Peri and became the guest of Osman Bey, from whom I purchased the grain. He is one of the Beys who are the feudal lords of that region, and still hold the Christian villagers as their serfs. For three days I ate with the Bey seated on the floor around a tray loaded with a great variety and quantity of food. I slept under quilts faced with silk, and listened to prayers offered by a white-turbaned hoja (teacher). The servants of the household came into the selamluk and prostrated themselves in prayer with their master; and the Christian stranger kneeled in his place, praying in the name of Christ, while they called upon God to listen to the intercession of Mohammed. As the prayers were all in Arabic, I was able to follow them and later to read portions of the Koran with the Hojas and discuss their meaning.

HEALTH OF THE BODY.

SOLOMON'S anatomical and physiological discoveries were so very great that he was nearly three thousand years ahead of the scientists of his day. He, more than one thousand years before Christ, seemed to know about the circulation of the blood, which Harvey discovered sixteen hundred and nineteen years after Christ, for when Solomon, in Ecclesiastes, describing the human body, speaks of the pitcher at the fountain, he evidently means the three canals leading from the heart that receive the blood like pitchers. When he speaks in Ecclesiastes of the silver cord of life, he evidently means the spinal marrow, about which, in our day, Doctors Mayo and Carpenter and Dalton and Flint and Brown-Sequard have experimented. And Solomon recorded in the Bible, thousands of years before scientists discovered it, that in his time the spinal cord relaxed in old age, producing the tremors of hand and head: "Or the silver cord be loosed."

In the text he reveals the fact that he had studied that largest gland of the human system, the liver, not by the electric light of the modern dissecting-room, but by the dim light of a comparatively dark age, and yet had seen its important functions in the God-built castle of the body.

Solomon knew of it, and had noticed either in vivisection or post-mortem what awful attacks sin and dissipation make upon it, until the fiat of Almighty God bids the body and soul separate, and the one it commends to the grave, and the other it sends to judgment. A javelin of retribution, not glancing off or making a slight wound, but piercing it from side to side "till a dart strike through his liver."

I preach to you the Gospel of Health. In taking a diagnosis of diseases of the soul you must also take a diagnosis of diseases of the body. As if to recognize this, one whole book of the New Testament was written by a physician. Luke was a medical doctor, and he discourses much of the physical conditions, and he tells of the good Samaritan's medication of the wounds by pouring in oil and wine, and extinguished eyesight of the beggar by the wayside, and lets us know of the hemorrhage of the wounds of the dying Christ and the miraculous post-mortem resuscitation. Any estimate of the spiritual condition that does not include also the physical condition is incomplete.

When the door-keeper of Congress fell dead from excessive joy because Burgoyne had surrendered at Saratoga, and Philip the Fifth of Spain dropped dead at the news of his country's defeat in battle, and Cardinal Wolsey faded away as the result of Henry the Eighth's anathema, it was demonstrated that the body and soul are Siamese twins, and when you think of the one with joy or sorrow you thrill the other. We may as well recognize the tremendous fact that there are two mighty fortresses in the human body, the heart and the liver; the heart the fortress of the senses, the liver the fortress of the virtues. You may have the head filled with all intellectual treasures, and the ear with all musical appreciation, and the mouth with all eloquence, and the hand with all industries, and the heart with all generousities, and yet a dart strike through the liver.

First, let Christian people avoid the mistake that they are all wrong with God, because they suffer from depression of spirits. Many a consecrated man has found his spiritual sky belighted and his hope of heaven blotted out and himself plunged chin deep in the slough of despond, and has said, "My heart is not right with God, and I think I must have made a mistake, and instead of being a child of light I am a child of darkness. No one can feel as gloomy as I feel and be a Christian." And he has gone to his minister for consolation, and he has collected Flavel's books and Cecil's books and Baxter's books, and read and read and read, and prayed and prayed and prayed, and wept and wept and wept, and groaned and groaned and groaned. My brother, your trouble is not with the heart, it is a gastric disorder or a rebellion of the liver. You need a physician more than you do a clergyman. It is not sin that blots out your hope of heaven, but bile. It not only yellows your eyeballs, and furs your tongue, and makes your head ache, but swoops upon your soul in dejections and forebodings.

My friend, Rev. Dr. Joseph F. Jones, of Philadelphia, a translated spirit now, wrote a book entitled, "Man, Moral and Physical," in which he shows how different the same things may appear to different people. He says: "After the great battle on the Mincio in 1859, between the French and the Sardinians on the one side and the Austrians on the other, so disastrous to the latter, the defeated army retreated, followed by the victors. A description of the march of each army is given by two correspondents of the London Times, one of whom travelled with the successful host, the other with the defeated. The difference in views and statements of the same place, scenes, and events, is remarkable. What made all this difference? asks the author. 'One condition only: the French are victorious, the Austrians have been defeated.'"

So, my dear brother, the road you are travelling is the same you have been travelling a long while, but the difference in your physical conditions makes it look different, and therefore the two reports you have given of yourself are as widely different as the reports in the London Times, from the two correspondents. Edward Payson, sometimes so far up on the Mount that it seemed as if the centripetal force of earth could no longer hold him, sometimes through a physical disorder was so far down that it seemed as if the nether world would clutch him. Poor William Cowper was a most excellent Christian, and will be loved in the Christian Church as long as it sings his hymns beginning, "There is a fountain filled with blood," "Oh, for a closer walk with God," "What various hindrances we meet," and "God moves in a mysterious way." Yet was he so overcome of melancholy, or black bile, that it was only through the mistake of the cab driver who took him to a wrong place, instead of the river bank, that he did not commit suicide.

Spiritual condition so mightily affected by the physical state, what a great opportunity this gives to the Christian physician, for he can feel at the same time both the pulse of the body and the pulse of the soul, and he can administer to both at once, and if medicine is needed he can give that, and if spiritual counsel is needed he can give that. Let Christian physicians unite with ministers of the Gospel in persuading good people that it is not because God is against them that they sometimes feel depressed, but because of their diseased body. I suppose David, the psalmist, was no more pious when he called on everything human and angelic, animate and inanimate, even from snowflake to hurricane, to praise God, than when he said, "Out of the depths of hell have I cried unto thee, O Lord;" or that Jeremiah was more pious when he wrote his prophecy than when he wrote his "Lamentations;" or that Alexander Cruden, the concordist, was a better man when he compiled the book that has helped ten thousand students of the Bible, than when under the power of physical disorder he was hand-cuffed and strait-waistcoated in Bethnal Green Insane Asylum. "Oh," says some Christian man, "no one ought to allow physical disorder to depress his soul. He ought to live so near to God as to be always in the sunshine." Yes, that is good advice; but I warrant that you, the man who gives the advice, has a sound liver. Thank God for a healthful hepatic condition, for, as certainly as you lose it, you will sometimes, like David, and like Jeremiah, and like Cowper, and like Alexander Cruden, and like ten thousand other invalids, be playing a Dead March on the same organ with which now you play a staccato.

My object at this point is not only to emoliate the criticisms of those in good health against those in poor health, but to show Christian people who are atrabilious what is the matter with them. Do not charge against the heart the crimes of another portion of your organism. Do not conclude that because the path to heaven is not arborescent with as fine a foliage, or the banks beautifully snowed with exquisite chrysanthemums as once, that therefore you are on the wrong road. The road will bring you out at the same gate whether you walk with the stride of an athlete or come up on crutches. Thousands of Christians, morbid about their experiences, and morbid about their business, and morbid about the present, and morbid about the future, need the sermon I am now preaching.

Another practical use of this subject is for the young. The theory is abroad that they must first sow their wild oats, and afterward Michigan wheat. Let me break the delusion. Wild oats are generally sown in the liver, and they can never be pulled up. They so preoccupy that organ that there is no room for the implantation of a righteous crop. You see aged men about us at eighty, erect, agile, splendid, grand old men. How much wild oats did they sow between eighteen years and thirty? None, absolutely none. God does not very often honor with old age those who have in early life sacrificed swine on the altar of the bodily temple. Remember, O young man, that while in after-life, and after years of dissipation, you may perhaps have your heart changed, religion does not change the liver. Trembling and staggering along these streets to-day are men, all bent, and decayed, and prematurely old for the reason that they are paying for liens they put upon their physical estate before they were thirty. By early dissipation they put on their body a first mortgage, and a second mortgage, and a third mortgage to the devil; and these mortgages are now being foreclosed, and all that remains of their earthly estate the undertaker will soon put out of sight. Many years ago, in fulfilment of my text, a dart struck through their liver, and it is there yet. God forgives, but outraged physical law never, never, never. That has a Sinai, but no Calvary. Solomon in my text knew what he was taking about, and he rises up on his throne of worldly splendor to shriek out a warning to all the centuries.

Stephen A. Douglas gave the name of "squatter sovereignty" to those who went out West and took possession of lands and held them by right of preoccupation. Let a flock of sins settle on your liver before you get to twenty-five years of age, and they will in all probability keep possession of it by an infernal squatter sovereignty. "I promise to pay at the bank five hundred dollars six months from date," says the promissory note. "I promise to pay my life thirty years from date at the bank of the grave," says every infraction of the laws of your physical being.

What? Will a man's body never completely recover from early dissipation in this world? Never. How about the world to come? Perhaps God will fix it up in the resurrection body so that it will not have to go limping through all eternity; but get the liver thoroughly damaged and it will stay damaged as long as you are here. Physicians call it cirrhosis of the liver, or inflammation of the liver, or fatty degeneration of the liver, but Solomon puts all these pangs into one figure, and says, "Till a dart strike through his liver."

Hesiod seemed to have some of this when he represented Prometheus his crimes, fastened to a pillar eagle feeding on his liver, which renewed again each night, so that devouring went on until finally Prometheus slew the eagle and rescued Prometheus. And a dissipated early life assures ity pecking away and clawing away liver year in and year out, and I the only Hercules who can bring power of its beak or unclench it. So, also, others wrote fables about tures preying upon the liver; but those here with whom it is no fabulous reality.

That young man smoking cigars, smoking cigars has no idea that getting for himself smoked liver young man has no idea that he early dissipation so depleted his that he will go into the battle or armed. Here is another young man if he put all his forces against the strength of God, might drive them but he is allowing them to be rebuffed by the whole army of mid-life dissipation, and what but immortal defeat await him?

Oh, my young brother, do not make a mistake that thousands are making opening the battle against sin too late, too late, and for the victory, too late. What brings that train from St. Louis into Jersey City hours late? They lost fifteen years early on the route, and that affects all the way; and they had to be switched off here and switched off there, detained here and detained there; a man who loses time and strength earlier part of the journey of life suffers for it all the way through.

Some years ago a scientific lecturer through the country exhibiting a canvas different parts of the human body when healthy, and the same part diseased. And what the world was is some eloquent scientist to go to the country, showing to our young men on blazing canvas the drunkard's liver, the idler's liver, the libertine's liver, the gambler's liver. Perhaps the sight might stop some young man before he comes to the catastrophe, and strike through his liver.

There is a kind of sickness that is fatal when it comes from overwork, God, or one's country, or one's family. I have seen wounds that were more beautiful than the most muscular man I have seen a green shade over a man shot out in battle, that was more beautiful than any two eyes that had passed through injury. I have seen an old man worn out with the malaria of Africa, who looked to me more radiant than a rubicund gymnast. I have seen a woman after six weeks' watching over a child, children down with scarlet fever, glory around her pale and wan face surpassed the angelic. It all depends how you got your sickness and how you battle your wounds.

If we must get sick and worn-out, in God's service and in the effort to win the world good. Not in the service of No! No! One of the most pitiful scenes that I ever witness, and I am it, is that of men or women converted in the fifties or sixties or seventies, and to be useful, but they so served the devil and Satan in the earlier part of their life that they have no physical energy for the service of God. They sacrificed their muscles, lungs, heart, and liver on a wrong altar. When such persons have been, through the good of a lifetime, crashing their bodies through the helmeted iniquities, spending their days and nights in doing the best way of curing their condition, and quieting their jangling nerves and rousing their laggard appetite, only to find that they are unable to extract the dart from their liver. Better converted late than never. Oh, yes; for they will get to heaven. They will go aloft when they might have wheeled up the steep hills of the world on Elijah's chariot. There is an old story that we used to sing in the countrying house when I was a boy, and I remember how the old folks' voices trembled with emotion while they sang, have forgotten all but two lines, but the lines are the peroration of my sermon.

"I'll save us from a thousand snare,
To mind religion young."

THE GOSPEL AMONG THE LIFE-SAVERS.

Mission that Reaches a Neglected Class—Providential Escapes, Striking Conversions and Answered Prayers—A Great Field for Missionary Effort.

HERE is probably no kind of evangelical missionary work at once so unique and picturesque, or which covers a wider territory, or reaches a more deserving class, than that which has to do with the life-saving crews along the coasts of the United States. Our National Life-Saving Service is one that has rapidly and greatly multiplied the number of its stations in late years. In the best of weather, the light-house and life-saving station crews are busy, but in the bleak, stormy days of a winter, they are frequently isolated for days at a time, and shut off from communication with the outer world. Their duties are full of peril, and the dangers attending such a calling can be imagined than described; but they are brave and resolute set of men, and the dangers of storm and flood fearlessly strive to save the lives of those in peril through storm or shipwreck. Year passes in which some of those fellows do not lose their own lives in the efforts at rescue, and to chronicle their gallant deeds even for a single season would fill many pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

When evangelical effort has been directed to the ingathering of a spiritual harvest in the cities and centres of population, those lonely life-savers have not been forgotten. Here and there, along our coasts, are devoted workers, and their field of Christian effort on the margin of the sea, among those courageous crews. Going from station to station from light-house to light-house, they carry with them the Gospel message, and tell everyone the story of Him who rode the waves in stormy Galilee. The mission of this most interesting class, that which is conducted by Rev. Ashley Cake along the New Jersey coast, with mission headquarters at Port Republic. His missionary work, conducted under the most adverse surroundings and beset by many difficulties, has already produced remarkable results, and there is hardly a station along the Atlantic coast where saving grace has not filled the heart of at least one brave fellow, and where an influence for good among the lawless associates. For two years this work has been successfully prosecuted, the missionary going up and down a long stretch of coast from Sandy Hook to Cape May, a distance of 160 miles, embracing forty-two stations and representing 336 men, or ten months of the year, deprived of all sanctuaries and privileges except such as are often to them by the missionary. At one station where the missionary was preaching, a certain said to him:

"I have been here twenty years, and this is the first time that service that has ever been held at this station." The work is distinctly un denominational and non-sectarian. Mr. Cake has conducted it wholly at his own expense since its beginning, and has resisted all inducements to make it secular. A feature of the work is that it brings the missionary into contact with government officials, representatives of different nationalities and many ship-pegged mariners, pleasure-boat fishermen and oystermen, all of whom come and listen reverently to the preaching of the Gospel.

Mr. Cake left a business calling to enter the ministry. He pursued the necessary studies in New Jersey, and preached and worked in North Carolina. In 1894 he first conceived the idea of carrying the Gospel to the life-saving crews. Shortly afterward a delegation from one of the Life-Saving Stations waited upon him and asked if he would come and preach for them. Then came a second delegation, with the same request. Other invitations followed and the first service was held at South Brigantine Station, N. J., on the evening of Jan. 31, 1895. Here he found not only the life-savers, but a crowd of other men and also women and children, eager to hear the Gospel. From that service, the mission steadily grew and the work increased. Telephone communication with other stations along the coast brought requests for religious services at such stations. Those services were crowded with seekers after the truth, and the missionary felt that God, indeed, had called him for a most blessed work, fraught with stupendous responsibilities. He saw the spiritual need of the Life-Saving Stations all along the coast, and he joyfully accepted the task that had been assigned him.

At first, there was not always a welcome ready for the missionary, after his long journeys along the coast to the Life-Saving Stations. Some were averse to hearing the Gospel preached and here and there rough men opposed it, but gradually the obstacles disappeared and all listened gladly. Sometimes repeated visits had to be made before the crews became sufficiently interested to assemble, and occasionally after the service began, a disturber would make an effort to stop it by noise; but after a time, even these efforts ceased, and the work went on quietly and amid reverent attention from all. Now every door is an open door and welcome is stamped on every face. The spirit of the Master, like an electric current, has entered every station along the New Jersey coast, and keepers and crews now express appreciation of the services. The his rounds among the stations, often many miles apart, he has had narrow escapes from freezing and drowning. At one lonely station, situated between two inlets, the surfmen being the only residents on an isolated islet, a marvelous display of divine power occurred. Notice of the meeting had been previously given and representatives from Philadelphia, Atlantic City, Tuckerton, Port Republic and Brigantine Beach had crossed the inlets to come to this little island for religious service. Fishermen and oystermen left their work and the station was crowded. The missionary preached earnestly, part of the discourse being preached on his knees, and arrows of conviction entered many hearts. Room was made for penitents, and strong, able-bodied, earnest men came forward and knelt, praying for mercy and pardon. Eleven souls were added to the kingdom.

The revival wave swept across the Inlet into Sea-Haven Station, where the Life-Saving men and their families have built a little chapel, furnished it with an organ, and maintain a public school seven months of the year.

At Chadwick Station, the missionary found one of the crew of surfmen so ill that his death was hourly expected. He pointed him to the Lamb of God. "No, Mr. Cake," he said, "I feel, if I am ever saved, I must kneel at the altar of some church." "Nay, my brother: Jesus can save you now and here." After earnest entreaties were made he knelt to pray for the sufferer, and to his (the missionary's) surprise, despite his weakness, the man crept off his little cot and joined his young wife and the preacher in prayer for his own salvation. The missionary finally had to leave him. A short time afterward he received a communication from the captain of the station, saying: "Brother F. has gone, but he was ready for the change."

"On another occasion," said Mr. Cake, "just as I was about to start on my trip up the coast, I entered my room and knelt down and over again 'some mother's boy.' Before I reached the foot of the stairs it was 'some mother's boy up the coast.' At each station where I stopped, I related this incident, and added that I was looking for that boy. I proceeded on my way till I came to the second station near the end of my trip up, where I found not only one, but two 'mother's boys'—boys no longer in years, but boys in heart, when the weeds and cobwebs of sin and neglect were brushed away. Their hearts were softened by a power divine and they both are now earnest Christians."

The journeys made by this evangelist are long and wearisome. At times, after preaching, he is out on the patrol along the surf with the men far into the night; but he is happy in his work. One thing that makes the work somewhat difficult, is that he must make it a sure point to reach stations for services at such hours as will not interfere with the station duties. His field is a large one, and the only impediment to the work's expansion is the lack of sufficient means to extend it, so that all the stations may be included. Up to the present time, he has depended solely on his own efforts to supply the means for the work, these being occasionally supplemented by the voluntary gifts of a few friends. It has been wholly a work of faith, and Mr. Cake believes, now that the field is so promising, that the same Divine Helper who has blessed it hitherto, will put it into the hearts of his people to strengthen and develop it still further, as it deserves. He will gladly answer any inquiries regarding the work that are addressed to him at Port Republic, N. J.

Our illustrations on this and the first pages of this issue present some of the phases of the life-savers' career, and of the missionary's experience as well. There are few callings where the life of the worker is more frequently in peril than that of the life-saving men. In fog, in driving gales and hurricanes, amid winter snow and rain, and the violent cyclones of spring and fall, the crews are ever on duty, ready to save life at the risk of their own. Summoned from bed to patrol the coast washed by raging seas or swept by icy winds, their life is one of the hardest that can be imagined. Those brave fellows, who risk so much to save others, are themselves well worth the saving, body and soul, and the evangelistic work now being conducted among them is one that deserves the warmest support of all who have the cause of the Gospel at heart. Many have been brought to Christ through the ministrations of the Life-Saving Mission. Its work is already known to many pastors of different denominations, along the coast, between New York and Atlantic City, and it has been strongly commended. With the support it deserves, this pioneer mission would soon be one of the grandest agencies for evangelization, carrying the message of Jesus' love and sacrifice to many hundreds of bronzed and weather-beaten seamen along our coasts, and planting over every life-saving station a bright beacon of Gospel invitation to the time is fast approaching when the Gospel will be proclaimed in every station and light-house along the sea-board.

There are many interesting incidents in connection with Mr. Cake's work that deserve to be related. At times, while on sinner, tossed about on life's stormy sea. Rev. Mr. Cake, the missionary, relates many interesting incidents connected with his work, some of them telling of providential rescue from great danger, and others showing the triumph of faith in answer to earnest prayer. He is greatly beloved by the surimen, who are always eager to serve the devoted worker who has brought so much of the Gospel light into their lives. It is very touching to listen to the big, rough fellows as they tell their troubles, their hopes and fears to the missionary, and follow his gentle leading to the one untailing source of consolation for troubled hearts—the Cross.

One cold, bleak Sabbath night in January, the missionary was out with the patrol, between eight and twelve o'clock, along the coast. His companion was a young suriman who had recently been converted. It was a rough night and the winds were high. After patrolling the beach about a mile, the suriman said:

"Brother Cake, do you see that pole yonder?"

"Yes," was the reply.
"I never allow myself to go by that pole without prayers," said the suriman.

Coming to the pole, above the roar of old Ocean's waves, the missionary heard the life-saver's voice in petition for the safety of those at sea and for the souls of all who were in peril on that night. The mariner on the ocean is not only remembered by loved ones at home, but the life-saver, while ready to risk his own life for

BRIEF NOTES.

A College Settlement among the Parsees of Bombay, India, is now doing excellent work under the direction of Miss Mary K. Dobson, the daughter of the English poet.

After wintering in Newton Centre, Mass., Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Cook have returned to their summer home at Cliff Seat, Ticonderoga. The Congregationalist says: "We are glad to say that Mr. Cook's health is somewhat improved."

Rev. Egerton R. Young, who for twenty-four years labored as a missionary among the Hudson Bay Indians, gave an instructive and inspiring address at Calvary Baptist Church, New York, recently concerning his labors.

There recently arrived in Siam the unexpected aid of two native missionaries sent by the native churches in Burmah to labor for a greatly neglected class, the Peguans of Siam. Thus the Gospel, wherever it is accepted, inculcates the missionary spirit.

A conference of the officers of Foreign Mission Boards was held recently in New York to make preliminary arrangements to hold a World's Missionary Conference here in 1900. There was a similar meeting held in London in 1885 with 1,500 delegates and 139 different societies represented.

The Volunteers of America, under the leadership of Mr. and Mrs. Billington Booth, commence their second year with 160 posts and 550 commissioned officers and 3,000 members of their auxiliary league. Mrs. Booth's work in the prisons has led to the organization of a Volunteer Prisoners' League, which has now 1,200 members.

At the recent quarterly meeting of the Board of Trustees of the United Society of Christian Endeavor, Secretary Baer reported the total enrollment of societies as 48,305, with a membership of 2,800,000.

Evangelist John McNeill preached last week at noon every day at Chickering Hall, New York, and at eight each evening at the Broadway Tabernacle. Large audiences assembled at each service, and listened intently to the eloquent preacher's incisive sermons.

Rev. George C. Needham, the evangelist, has taken charge, during the absence of Rev. D. M. Stearns, of the Weekly Union Bible Class on Mondays at two o'clock in the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, corner Fifty-third Street, New York.

The Rev. F. B. Meyer's jubilee birthday has been celebrated by a meeting in Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, London, which was crowded with friends from all parts. Rev. Dr. Pierson conveyed the congratulations of American Christians.

Preparations are well forward for a successful convention of the Baptist Young People's Union of America, which will be held at Chattanooga July 15-18. Those who are planning to go would do well to communicate either with the convention committee at Chattanooga, or, in this vicinity, with the New York transportation leader, Mr. John P. Goodwin, 123 Twenty-eighth Street, Brooklyn.

We regret to hear of the death of Rev. E. W. Ruliffson, who passed away May 2, after an illness of eighteen months. Mr. Ruliffson had done valuable service in the Bowery Mission and in other religious and philanthropic agencies, and his death will be mourned by a large circle of friends who knew and loved him well. Mrs. Ruliffson writes that to the last his prayers for the Bowery Mission, where in former years he had often spoken, were fervent and unceasing.

The American Society of Religious Education at its recent annual meeting re-elected General John Eaton, president, and Rev. J. E. Gilbert, D. D., secretary. From the annual report it appears that last year the society engaged the services of ninety-three scholars, that it held five conventions. Two study courses have been established by the society—the Sunday Teachers' Normal College which has now an enrollment of 10,186 and the Bible Reader's Union with 1,491 members.

A remarkable movement among the Jews of Southern Russia is described by the Independent. It says that a number of pious and influential Israelites are establishing associations for the reading and study of the Scriptures, both in the homes of the people and in their public assemblies. Much attention will be devoted to the prophetic books of the Old Testament and to investigating the claims of Christians that Jesus of Nazareth has in his life and work and death been the fulfiller of many utterances of the prophets which have for so long been stumbling-blocks to the Jews.

The following dates have been fixed for the Northfield summer conferences: June 10, Sacred Concerts of students in the Northfield schools; June 15—July 4, The World's Student Conference; July 6-20, Conference of Young Women's Christian Associations; July 26-Aug. 10, International Conference of Christian Workers. The Young Men's Christian Association Encampment will continue during July and August. The musical exercises will be under the charge of Mr. Ira D. Sankey and Mr. D. B. Lowner. It is hoped that Mr. Geo. C. Stearns will also be able to take part in some of the meetings. All particulars as to board and lodging can be obtained by addressing Mr. A. G. Moody, East Northfield, Mass.

DRUMMOND AS I KNEW HIM.

BY IRA D. SANKEY.

I'm not ashamed to own my Lord,
Or to defend his cause,
Maintain the glory of his Cross
And honor all his laws.

THUS sang Henry Drummond, as he lay upon his dying bed, the last Sabbath he was to spend on earth. His life-long friend, Dr. Hugh Barbour, in whose father's home I was entertained in Edinburgh in 1873-4, was staying a few days with him at Tunbridge Wells, England, and with the desire of comforting his friend during the slowly moving hours of that last Sabbath evening, he took his seat at the piano and began to sing softly some of the professor's favorite hymns. Nothing seemed to arouse the attention of the weary sufferer until the doctor struck the chords of the good old Psalm tune, "Martyrdom," and began singing the hymn—doubtless taught Drummond by his godly father and mother in his childhood, at Stirling:

I'm not ashamed to own my Lord.

Then, lifting up his pale and emaciated hand, he began singing the grand old hymn with Dr. Barbour, beating the time through to the end.

When they had finished the last verse he said: "Ah, Hugh, there is nothing to beat that." To my mind this was a splendid confession of his faith in the everlasting verities of the Gospel, and a grand Doxology with which to close his Christ-like life.

It is often the case, that in such an hour as this, when the pomp and glory of this world are fading away from man's mortal vision, and he begins to search diligently for solid footing as he enters the "valley of the shadow," then the real faith that is in him often finds expression in some sweet psalm or hymn, such as

O God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come,
Our shelter from the stormy blast
And our eternal home, which Drummond also sang that Sabbath day upon his bed of pain. Happy and blest are they who can thus sing as they near the Pearly Gates.

It is not generally known that Mr. Moody was the first to discover Henry Drummond. When we began our work in Edinburgh, Drummond was then a young University student there, and soon became greatly interested in the meetings. He was one of the first to suggest the holding of special meetings for young men, and soon became one of Mr. Moody's most efficient helpers in that branch of the work.

Mr. Drummond's young friend, James Stalker, now one of the leading ministers of Scotland, was also one of the most active and helpful students who took part in the work. So successful were they that Mr. Moody invited both of these young men to accompany him for the purpose of looking after the young men who attended our meetings in large numbers, but whom it was difficult to get into the inquiry meetings.

Mr. Stalker was unable to leave his work in the University, but Drummond accepted the call, and for several years labored with us all over Great Britain. A more competent and successful worker never went into an inquiry meeting thousands in the old country to point to Henry Drummond as the one who first led them to Christ.

At the close of our last campaign in Scotland, in which Mr. Drummond taken no active part, I was resting in Edinburgh, and one day Charles take up an American newspaper in which I found what purported to be an account from some of Prof. Drummond's friends. I was pleased with the article, and cut it out and sent it to the Professor in Glasgow, asking him if these were his own words, and if so, where they had been found, as they had a ring of truth about them that pleased me very much.

The next day I received the following letter, together with the printed "Confession" which I believe will be read with interest by his many friends in this country. On his last visit to America in 1873, he showed him, while in my house, the "Confession" and the "extract," and asked him if he had any objection to the publication of the same if occasion should arise. Reading them over he replied: "Certainly, you have my hearty permission to publish them in any way you may think best."

And now that he has passed into "Silent Land," and we shall no longer hear his cheery voice or see his face, I feel that his friends in this country will be glad to get this closer look at the heart of one of the most Christ-like of men.

EXTRACT.

"The power to set the heart afire, to renew the springs of action, comfort the soul, the sense of the infinite within the single soul, and the recoverability of a man at his worst, are the gifts of God."

"The freedom from guilt, the forgiveness of sins, come from Christ's cross; hope of immortality springs from the grave. Personal conversion means a personal religion, a personal relationship to God, a personal debt to Christ, a personal dedication to his cause. These, I believe, are the supreme aims of the Christian life."

LETTER.

3 PARK CIRC.

GLASGOW, April 3, 1897.

My Dear Mr. Sankey:—Would it be calling themselves by the sacred name of Christian, had your charity: knowledge, meaning, as you and Mr. Moody "judge not," and afforded a man at a frank trial before convicting him.

These are my words, and the I never been an hour when the truth which they represent were not among the deepest convictions. Nor, so far as I know, have I ever given anyone ground to believe otherwise, nor is there any of my writings where these same ideas would not be found either expressed or understood.

If you ask me why I do not write books on these themes, I reply that I believe one's only excuse for writing is, that he has something to say that is being said.

These things are being said. Hundreds of looks, and millions of tracts are saying them afresh every month and year. I therefore feel no call to enter into that ground. My message lies in the forgotten truths, the false emulations, and the wrong accent. To every one who works.

Let me thank you most heartily for your kindness in writing. The way to the souls, to make them hard and bitter, is to be revenged on them as man on man. If I have escaped this terrible fate it is because there are others like you who "think no evil."

But tell your friends that they know what they do, or what solemn duty they imperil when they judge.

Yours very sincerely,

HENRY DRUMMOND.

The words quoted are from the "Program of Christianity"—the last I have written. Page 43-45. I hope you will kindly accept the copy I am sending you along with this.

I feel it a great honor to have been associated with him in the Ministry of work and shall ever remember him as one of the most perfect gentlemen I ever knew, and I heartily agree with the statement made by one of his own family in a letter just received from Stirling, "He was a man lived Christ on this earth."

FAITH AND WORKS.

Sunday School Lesson for May 30. James 2:1-23 Golden Text: James 2:18.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

FAITH without works! A kind of conversion which leaves a man unbroken before God, and living for himself still. A conversion where self is still upon the throne; old things have not passed away, all things have not become new (11. Cor. 5:17), and where "a new creature" is indeed a thing of doctrine but not of fact. O, how common is this sort of thing in our days! While in trade, every thing is counterfeited which can be, and the devil busy in producing counterfeit doctrines. When God created the visible world he created the fruit tree which bore fruit, whose seed was in itself (Gen. 1:11-12). And as surely as the earth closes its own especial kind of seed in the garden of the Lord, so of faith, if it is living, bears the fruit of good works which contains the seed of faith. "Faith if it have not works is dead in itself" (Jas. 2:17 R. V.). "Faith without works is barren" (Verse 20, R. V.). "In Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh love" (Gal. 5:6). Faith is not a simple opinion, expressed by the intellect, it is that principle revealed by the Holy Ghost within us, which which joins us to him. If no divine fruit comes out of faith in God, it is proof evident that no such is in us, and that we are not fitted to him. The cause must produce effects. While it is equally true that by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified" (Rom. 3:20), it is also true that without the works of faith God's promise of faith to be non-existent. Faith which always bring forth its true fruit, it is "faith which worketh by love."

What then is the difference between "the works of the law" by which no man shall be justified, and the works which come from faith whereby we are justified and without which faith alone cannot stand? By the works of the law how man have attempted to recommend themselves to God, and acquire merit for their good deeds independently of the precious blood of Christ, by which alone we are brought nigh to God! But this is to ignore sin; it is to hold lightly the holiness of God, and to be guilty of unseemly presumption towards him.

Works of faith are such as spring naturally from the life of God within us; they are the fruit of any strain or effort of our own; we can never claim any merit for them; "It is God which worketh in us, that he will and to do of his good pleasure" (Phil. 2:14); these good works are those unto which we have been created in Christ Jesus and all God asks of us is to trust him for the power and grace and to obey him without considering whether we can or cannot; whether we like or do not like what he calls us. Thus the works of the law proceed from fallen man, and the works of faith proceed from the Holy God, the works of the law exalt man, the works of faith glorify God.

The Apostle James argues that a few vain words spoken to a hungry, shivering man have no power in them to feed and clothe that man, except deeds accompany the words; and just as little can it avail us, as unreal will it be in God's sight, if our faith be a thing of words or opinion which does not bring forth divine fruit in our lives. The apostle goes on to ask the question: "Yea, a man may say, 'Thou hast faith and I have works; show me thy faith without thy works and I will show thee my faith by my works.'" Faith is visible; it is only seen by what it does, and the apostle brings forth the solemn truth that a faith without works is one which is shared by the very hosts of hell: "the devils believe and tremble" but they cannot believe and love; they cannot believe and do divine things.

A Barren Faith.

An unfruitful faith, a faith which leaves us unconverted to the image of Christ, leaves us with the awful possibility of believing in God as Satan's hosts do, and working with all our power against him. The apostle further quotes Abraham as an example of faith: "Was not Abraham our father, justified by faith when he had offered Isaac, his son, upon the altar? Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect?" It was something more than vain words, something more than the mere assent to a doctrine, which gave that man of God such confidence in the promises which God had made to him that he could offer up in obedience the very son on whose life those very promises hung. His faith went the tremendous length of practically trusting God to raise that son from the dead whom he should slay. He went counter to his natural feelings as a father at God's command; he did not hesitate to leave to God the consequences of an act which to all appearances would render utterly impossible the fulfilment of his promises. Only God could have produced such faith in his servant, and faith could never have been manifest under a test less tremendous. "And the Scripture was fulfilled which said [prophetically Gen. 15:6] Abraham believed God and it was imputed unto him for righteousness, and he was called the friend of God."

Let us not shrink back astonished and perplexed, if God calls us to tests of our faith which seem to give the lie to God's promises; it is just under such that we are put to the proof as to what kind of faith we have. Let us be content to be often driven into a corner where it is impossible to explain to others the position in which we find ourselves. How difficult it would have been for Abraham to explain to Sarah God's dealings with him at this time! In obedience to God, he had risen early in the morning, going steadily forward till he was the God-selected spot, leaving the young men with the ass, that he and the lad might "go yonder and worship" (Gen. 22:5) and come again to you. Worship? Yes; that act of faith was the truest worship and holy adoration. "Come again to you?" Yes; this was the faith of this father of the faithful.

God had prophesied that he should believe and the Scripture was fulfilled. We too, if we have faith in God, are called to fulfil the Scriptures which are written about them that believe in God. What God says of them that believe is not only possible for us but our bounden duty; we can do all which God commands. It is a high vocation to which we are called that our lives should be a proof of the truth of God's Word, that men should see us to be in our measure the living word of God, the Bible lived out, as our Lord was. Paul saw it to be his stewardship that he should fulfil the Word of God. (Col. 1:25), showing his faith by his works. It was faith which worketh by love that made Peter trust the name of Jesus for the healing of the impotent man at the gate of the temple. Another blessed instance of the same was when Stephen prayed with his dying breath for his murderers, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." (Acts 7:59). It is faith working by love and fulfilling the word of God when we love those who most try us, when we "glory in tribulations seeing God's side of them, and count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations" or trials (Jas. 1:2, 3). This spirit is not indigenous; it is a heavenly plant, it springs from faith in God.

One more instance is quoted by James: Rahab. This woman had heard, in common with her people, of the miraculous exodus of the children of Israel from Egypt, and that their God went with them in a cloud by day and a fire by night; and it entered deeply into her heart that this God was the true God. Despite all her unpromising past, and although she was one alone in her faith, she took her life in her hand, and stood on the side of the God of Israel. It was no light thing for this heathen woman thus to risk her life and the wrath of her people; but she believed in God and her works bore witness that she believed. No mere sentiment, no intellectual belief would have borne such fruit. She had yielded up herself to the God of Israel in whom she believed, and her actions sprung from a heart and will conquered by her God. Is our faith of this order? In this day of shams and unreality, are we going against the current by the very fact that God and heaven are realities to us?

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

not care what denomination

ARGUMENTS like this of James are very much in evidence at the present time, and some of them are perversions of his reasoning. "I judge by the life," says one, "I do not care what the man believes, or what he belongs to. If he is leading a good life he will come out all right in the end." But we do not find it so. The man sometimes ends in prison or in disgrace. When a good mother is sending her boy into the city where he will be exposed to temptation, she tries to instil good principles into his mind. She knows that although he has been a good boy at home, he may not be a good boy when he is not under her eye. So she tries to get him to believe in goodness and to do right from strong motives. Right thinking and a right faith are the only sure foundations for a good life. Good deeds, as we know by experience, may be done from a bad motive. When a man does some noble, generous thing in order to make himself a name, or in order to advance his political, or social, or business interests, he is liable to do some mean thing when it pays best to do that. We are continually being disappointed and the Church of Christ humiliated by the collapse of some conspicuous reputation. A good life is not everything in religion; there must be faith and sound principle at the foundation. Real religion is faith operating in action and producing good works. Does your belief affect your life? If not, it is a barren, dead faith, and of no use to you, as James says. On the other hand, if you are doing good for the sake of the benefit it brings, either in money or reputation, your good deeds are of no account. Both errors are fatal, and both kinds of people need to have the truth told them in plain language. In apostolic times, James and Paul were raised up to tell it. There were the two errors then, as there are now, and while James assailed one error, Paul assailed the other. The two men appear to contradict each other, but their differences were more apparent than real. If James had met a man who was indifferent about Christ and expecting to buy his way to heaven by his gifts or services, he would have talked to him very much as Paul wrote; and, on the other hand, many quotations might be made from Paul's epistles to show that he had as great a contempt as James for a barren faith that did not produce good living.

The view James took was largely the result of his position. He is believed to have been the James mentioned Matt. 13:55, as one of Christ's brothers. He was not an apostle, nor even a believer in Christ up to the time of the crucifixion, but appears to have been convinced when Christ rose from the dead. He is said to have been a Nazarite like John the Baptist and to have been a strict Jew, observing the minutest parts of the law. There is a passage in Josephus showing that he was revered even by the Jews, as a very holy man. He became chief pastor or bishop of the church at Jerusalem, was careful to observe the fasts and feasts and times of prayer and did not in any degree relax his Jewish observances when he became a Christian. But all around him he saw Jews whose lives were hollow and hypocritical. They thought that so long as they were Jews and worshipped one God and did not practice idolatry like the heathen, they were sure of eternal life, no matter how they lived. It is easy to see from his epistle, that he was in contact with men who lied and cursed and oppressed the poor; but their opinions and their creeds were right. They were orthodox. James tells them that such a faith as theirs could not save them. It was a barren, dead faith, which had no effect on their lives. The race is not extinct. There are people now who know the truth, who are living selfish lives and disgracing the Christian name. Their faith is not the kind that saves the soul. The kind that saves is the living faith which is seen in a gentle, kindly helpful life.

Faith wrought with his works. It is a remarkable fact, proved by abundant testimony, that the surest way to a reformation of life is not to preach the terrors of the law, but the love of Christ. Dr. Chalmers, at the close of his life, said that in his early ministry he preached with all his soul against certain sins, warning his people that God had forbidden such things, and that he would surely punish the offender. Dr. Chalmers said that he had never known a single case of conversion from that preaching. "I am not aware of an instance in which all the vehemence with which I urged the virtues and proprieties of life had the weight of a feather on the moral habits of my hearers." But when he preached Christ, and forgiveness through him, conversions began to take place at once. His experience is that of other preachers. To preach Christ is the surest way to induce morality.

Depart in peace. Columbus, going from court to court, to obtain money for his voyage of discovery, could test the sincerity of faith. Benedictions and assurances of belief in his theories were of no use to him while there was no resulting action. Ferdinand and Isabella gave the best proof that they believed when they furnished the ships for his voyage.

Abraham believed God. James mentions the fact as if it was remarkable. How many people would like to have it said of them that they did not believe God? The very sound of the words strikes us as blasphemous. Yet if we believed God thoroughly how different our lives would be! Mr. Cecil gave his child an object lesson on this subject. She had found it difficult to understand what faith was. Her father saw her playing with some beads which seemed to delight her wonderfully. Her father said: "You seem to be very pleased with those beads?" "Yes, Papa." "Now, my dear, I want you to throw them into the fire." The child looked up at him in amazement, as if she could scarcely believe that he wished her to do such a hard thing. Mr. Cecil said: "You may do as you please, but my wish is to have you throw the beads into the fire." The child thought it over. She knew her father loved her and must have some good reason for wishing her to do this thing. So she gathered up the beads and with a mighty effort cast her treasures into the fire. The father kissed her and told her that he was pleased to see how much she trusted him. He did not explain, until a few days afterward, when he brought her a box of larger and better beads. Her faith in him was rewarded then, or justified, as the Bible puts it. Christians are not always willing to show as much confidence in their heavenly Father.

RELIEF SHIPS SOON TO SAIL.

One Will Start for India Early in June—Corn Still Pouring in—Some Remarkable Gifts—A Gracious Outpouring of Christian Benevolence.

REV. J. P. BRUSHINGHAM.

AS the time approaches for the departure of the corn-laden steamships for India, the magnificent extent and character of Christian America's benevolence begin to be apparent. During the past week, gifts of corn have flowed in a steady stream from a score of States. Every mail has brought advices of more corn cars on the way. The Famine Fund managers are now hopeful of being able to send one of the corn-laden steamers off not later than the first week of June. Just how soon the others will follow must depend upon the rapidity with which the corn is received; but it is hoped that there will not be a longer interval than a few weeks between the starting of the first cargo, and the clearance of the last of the Famine Fleet from these shores. Toward this consummation every energy must now be bent, since it is of the utmost importance that the vessels be dispatched at the earliest practicable date.

At present everything looks favorable to the carrying out of the programme indicated. Immediately after the departure of the first of the corn vessels, Dr. Klopsch will proceed to India by the quickest steamship route, and will probably arrive in Calcutta a week or more in advance of the famine ship. This will afford an opportunity to meet and consult with a committee of missionaries in that city, at which, it is expected, all the Protestant denominations operating in the Indian field will be represented. At that conference, the needs of the various localities in the famine-stricken districts will be discussed and details of distribution arranged. It is expected that the Indian government will extend all the necessary transportation facilities from Calcutta inland, so that there will be no delay in forwarding the corn to the interior. Assurances of hearty co-operation have already been received.

Among the thousands who have aided the relief movement since the start, none have been more enthusiastic or rendered more effective service than the Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board of Elkhart, Ind. The Mennonites have no missionary in India; yet their hearts have been so touched with pity for the sufferings of that afflicted land, that they have raised among their own people no less than seventy-five full car loads of corn, which will be included in the cargoes to be sent to India by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Elder George Lambert, who is now in Bombay, will represent Mennonite interests and co-operate in the work of distribution. Among the Mennonite brethren who have done yeoman service in aid of this great life-saving work are Messrs. A. B. Kol, president of the Board, John I. Funk of Elkhart; S. F. Sprunger, J. S. Colman, J. S. Lehman, H. A. Mumaw, D. F. Jentzen, S. Heininger and G. L. Bender, secretary and treasurer of the Board. The Mennonites have made a magnificent record of serving of the highest recognition and praise. Their self-sacrifice will doubtless be the means of saving many precious lives.

One of the most active and energetic promoters of the India Famine Relief work in the West is Rev. J. P. Brushingham, D.D. pastor of the Fulton Street M. E. Church, Chicago. Dr. Brushingham, who is prominently identified with many phases of Christian work in the Western city, is a member of the Chicago Relief Committee and has been a constant attendant at its meetings, and to his energy and enterprise is due, in large measure, whatever of success it has attained as an organization. He has been a pastor in Chicago for seventeen consecutive years and this year was elected President of the Methodist Social Union, and Chairman of the Preachers' Meeting Executive Committee. Socially and religiously, he is a distinct influence in Chicago and his connection with the India Relief Work has been of the greatest value in bringing it before the people of the West.

Among the numerous letters that come to us daily in connection with the relief work, there are many that we would be glad to publish, if space permitted. One that will be read with especial interest, since it comes from a native of India, now visiting this country is as follows:

I am a native of India, spending a short time in this country in special preparation for the mission field in India, where I have already labored for thirteen years.

I desire to thank you in the name of two hundred millions of my desolate, hungry, starving people for your very earnest and successful efforts in their behalf. I pray that you may be blessed and helped in this good work. We do not have a famine of bread every year; the last great famine of which I was an eye-witness was in 1877-78. What I saw then, I prayed that I might not see again. My prayer has been granted, as I am more than (10,000) ten thousand miles away—but my soul is burdened as I read in home letters of the suffering, want and woe of my people.

vation, and everywhere there is distress. Two years ago wheat could be bought at the rate of fourteen pounds for one rupee, and coarser grains, fifty-two pounds for the same amount of money, but now only six or seven pounds of wheat and twenty pounds of the other can be bought for that amount, so you can imagine how much distress it means to those whose incomes are no more than when grain was cheap, and could then only manage to exist on what they had.

The English Government has started Relief Works and established a good many Poor Houses, but even with that there are many thousands who cannot get help and are dying daily. In the market-places women are offering their children for sale, and there are many who are entirely without either parent. One day recently a woman came to us with two very small boys and offered them both for fifteen cents. We did not buy them, but took the mother and children and gave them food. They were simply skin and bone, and as ravenous as wild beasts, and it would make one weep almost to see how the children snatched at everything within their reach which could be eaten, even leaves and blades of grass. Now they look more like human beings and begin to show the effect of food—but they are only one instance out of many, and we have so little money to buy food for them.

In our Mission Compound at Fatehpur, there are about 100 children and fifty men and women who have been brought there in a starving condition, and it is only a very small part of the suffering ones in that region. Manipur is not so badly off as many parts but we see enough here to make us sad too. If the rains are not full and early this season I do not dare to think of what will be the condition of India next autumn, but we hope for the best, though it seems as though God had been so long patient with the idolatry of this people that he is now showing them his judgment and power.

What Classes are Suffering.

Rev. E. W. Parker, M. E. Church, Shah-jahanpore, writes:

"The class (in that section of India) that is starving is made up of temporary workplan is the best yet invented, yet is most distressing part of the famine. People will live through it all, at the end of the day they will go home to die by the thousands. European officials carefully supervise these works and do all they can to make them real relief works; and crowds make every effort most distressing. "There are poorhouses open everywhere for the aged and helpless, and the fed free. So our famine, you see, is a famine of work for the people. Aid will enable us to help thousands that they can live and work, and not and die. We will not give without unless people are helpless. We can do some kind of work that can help people and save multitudes. Here are very thankful. No one can thank you for this aid. Cawnpore to-night to meet all the who have received money, and advise about work."

Of similar tenor is the account of Rev. J. E. Scott, M. E. Mission, Muttra, sends to the New York Christian Advocate. He says:

In the Central Provinces many have died; thousands are now starving; parents are leaving their children for a nick and hundreds are being gathered into poorhouses and orphanages.

In the Northwest it is not so bad, but wheat was sold at one anna (one-eighth of a rupee), and is now selling at only one anna. You can see that a man with a family of four or five rupees per month, must go to the most of our Christians do not get more than that. Many can get no work at all of our pastor-teachers only get five rupees per month. We cannot raise the money for we have no money. Their people do not do it, for they are themselves in ruin. We cannot dismiss them, for they mean ruin. We are, therefore, in the greatest crises of Christian mission have 100,000 Christians. What do we do? Pray? We do. Beg? We do. You don't sound it out that India needs help? This is a real urgent need. Starving people can I have taken in boys to try to educate them. Twelve dollars a year will feed, educate them. Can you not get some to take some boys? They will make us preachers, and their souls will be saved from death.

Miss Clara M. Beach, a missionary at Cawnpore, working under the auspices of the Women's Union Missionary Society, to which one thousand dollars of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund was given in contribution, writes in a letter published last week: "We are very grateful to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD which will help the outside world. Much more will be needed some time for the grain will probably remain high for months to come. Miss Beach also describes a number of some relief works where thousands of people were employed in road-making. She speaks of their hunger, their faces and of the sad, weary expression of misery in their poor eyes.

These testimonies from the devoted men and women, who are churches of America have been sent to India to proclaim the Gospel of Christ, must be gratifying to our readers. As we read these letters, describing the suffering of which they were eye-witnesses, we are thankful that relief in money has been sent and in food will soon be on its way. Enabling the missionaries to feed the starving people our readers have more to aid the cause of Christ than they can ever know; and if the involved self-denial, as they undoubtedly in many cases, we may be quite that He who knows our hearts and ways has been pleased by the offering.

A VILLAGE MARKET IN INDIA BEFORE THE FAMINE.

Where, in former years the village markets were well supplied with fruits and cereals, they are now almost deserted and the prices of the scant stock of food have risen to prohibitive figures.

God bless you and your co-laborers. Accept, I pray you, from a sad but grateful heart sincerest thanks.

The most recent letters from India show how gladly the gift of Christian America will be received. The suffering continues and the supplies for relief work are getting low. It is certain that the vast quantity of corn which will now soon be on its way will be hailed with a glad welcome by the workers in the afflicted districts. "We are very grateful," writes Phoebe E. Ward, a missionary in the Central Provinces, "for the gifts from America, sent for the relief of the perishing. Many are dying slowly of starvation in this district, and the number requiring relief is increasing. Our mission force is small, and we regret our inability to do more for the relief of the people."

This letter from the wife of a missionary at Mainpuri was received recently by Miss Gilmore, a missionary of Romayne Chapel in Fourteenth Street, New York City, and read at the Mothers' Meeting:

It was very generous of the women in the Mothers' Meeting to send the money for my work, and please tell them I shall use it to the best possible advantage, while I shall always remember their gift with gratitude. In these days we have use for all the money we can get, for it is a time of great want and distress in India. For several years the rains have not been enough, and last year there was so little that the grain crops were almost a failure, so that now famine is abroad in the land. In some parts thousands of people are slowly dying of starvation, and everywhere there is distress. Two years ago wheat could be bought at the rate of fourteen pounds for one rupee, and coarser grains, fifty-two pounds for the same amount of money, but now only six or seven pounds of wheat and twenty pounds of the other can be bought for that amount, so you can imagine how much distress it means to those whose incomes are no more than when grain was cheap, and could then only manage to exist on what they had.

"Then the small farmers are also in great suffering. They have sold their cattle, not even keeping one pair of oxen; their seed corn is eaten up, and then they, too seek relief. Government has helped these to sink wells for irrigation, and has kept many on their land in this way.

"The relief work—making roads or anything to give employment—is designed to give work to all who have none at a very low rate of pay. A reader asks at once, Why not give good, fair wages? Because the crowds that would come for good wages would overwhelm the entire effort. This gives the people a chance to live, but it is an awful chance. They leave home and all, go away to the relief work, and camp under trees or in little grass huts for months. Even women and children, all working, just to live. The entire

THE PARIS HOLOCAUST.

HORROR and dismay have thrilled French society, as it has read the story of the dreadful loss of life which occurred on May 4th, at the burning of the aristocratic bazaar in Paris. It has become an annual custom to hold a bazaar for the benefit of various charities, and the ladies of the land have manifested their interest in it by presiding at the stalls. This year the bazaar was held in a wooden building representing a street in medieval Paris. It was a hundred feet long and sixty wide. The unsightly roof of the walls was concealed by banding and tapestries, suspended from the ceiling and gracefully draped above and between the stalls. About four o'clock, when the crowd of visitors was largest, about eighteen hundred persons were in the building, there was a slight explosion, the illuminating apparatus of the gasolene lamp exploded and set fire to the hangings of No. 13 stall, at which the Duchess d'Uzes presided. She saw it and cried, "Fire! Fire! Fire!" Instantly there was a rush for the doors. The people appear to have known of only one exit in front, though it is known that there were several other exits. They struggled to reach it, but they stumbled on the way, and were pushed down by the people from the rear and became a mass of bodies, over which others fell. The doors were completely blocked by heaps of prostrate forms. At last some one discovered a door in the rear which opened on to the printing office. The bars of the door were wrenched out and a number of people in the rear escaped by that way. The fire spread with great rapidity, the hanging tapestries feeding the flames. One survivor says that within twelve minutes after the first alarm, all four walls were in flames. Burning fragments of paper and the decorations fell upon the struggling crowd, setting alight the ladies' dresses. Many of the burning people looked like living torches. A mother-stricken among the crowd, with others on fire. The shrieks and wails from burning people were heard outside, above the roar of the flames, but the heat was so intense, that little could be done to save the victims. At last the fire burned through the pillars supporting the roof of the building and it fell upon the crowd of panic-stricken creatures below, crushing to death all who were still living. One hundred and thirty-seven bodies were taken out of the ruins and carried to the Palais de l'Industrie for identification, but the police believe that this by no means represents the loss of life. Many persons may have perished whose bodies were entirely consumed. From inquiries among the persons, who are believed to have been in the building at the time, it is computed that fully two hundred persons died. Besides these there were many more so seriously injured that they died of the fire or the crush that they had to undergo in the hospital. Among the dead, the most distinguished was the Duchess d'Alencon, sister of the Empress of Austria. Her fate resulted in the death of her uncle, the Duc d'Aumale, the distinguished son of King Louis Philippe. He was seized with apoplexy after reading the news of his niece's death and expired in a few minutes. All the dead were men and women of high rank, members of families famous in the history of France. The tragedy is all the more shocking because of the contrast with the lives of the victims. The high-born men and women had been reared from the ordinary ills of life and were accustomed to ease and luxury and the pleasures of the most frivolous, pleasure-loving society in the world. It would, therefore, be especially horrible to them to come to such an end, for which it is to be feared, their lives, in many cases, could have given them no preparation. Their fate was like that with which God threatened the haughty daughters of his people:

And it shall come to pass that instead of sweet spices there shall be rottenness; and instead of well-set hair baldness; and instead of a stomacher a girding of sack-cloth; and burning instead of beauty. (Isa. 3:24.)

A Double Funeral Service.

A family quarrel has developed at Elizabeth, N. J., out of the death of one of the citizens. He had occasion some time ago to seek medical advice and was ultimately obliged to go into a hospital. He was a Protestant but some of his relatives who are Roman Catholics, succeeded in gaining for him admission to the Catholic Hospital of the Alexian Brothers. They did not, however, succeed in saving the man's life. He died in the hospital, and the body was sent to his home for interment. It appears that before his death he was admitted to the Catholic Church, and his relatives were duly notified of the fact by the hospital authorities. The Catholics among them attended on the day of the funeral with a priest who conducted the funeral service over the body. An hour later a Methodist minister arrived with Protestant relatives of the deceased and conducted a Protestant service. It is a serious fact that both sets of relatives contend that there was only one service, as the other did not amount to anything. They are both right, if by their expression they mean any benefit to the dead man. Salvation would be much easier than it is, if it could be effected by the services held over the dead body.

And I saw the dead small and great stand before God... and the dead were judged according to their works. (Rev. 20:12.)

Caught by the Tide.

A singular accident befell a boy last week at Hoboken, N. J. He hired a boat from a local boat-house and rowed out for an afternoon's fishing. The place he finally selected after trying several others was under the bridge of a ferry-house. He remained for an hour or more intent on his sport and then, being tired, lay down in the bottom of the boat and went to sleep. He was rudely awakened some two hours later by the boat striking violently against the bridge. The tide had risen while he slept and he realized

Seeking Buried Gold.

A report comes from Springfield, Me., that a clue has been obtained to a long-sought treasure. It is several thousand dollars in eagles and double eagles which a Maine farmer is known to have hidden and which have never been found. In 1863, the farmer, who was a pronounced that if it rose many more inches, the boat would fill and sink. He made desperate efforts to force the boat from under the bridge, but it was quite fast. It seemed then as if death was inevitable. He shouted and batted with the butt of the oar on the flooring of the bridge just above his head. One of the bridge employees heard him and climbed down on the piling and looked under the bridge. He saw the boat, but could not get it out. Finally axes were procured and the flooring of the bridge immediately over the boat was torn up. The boy crawled through the aperture and was saved. The rescue came only just in time. The boat was already half full of water. In another quarter of an hour it was full and if the boy had remained in it he would have been drowned. It is safe to predict that that boy will never go to sleep in a boat again. It will be well for him, too, if his escape teaches him to be on his guard against spiritual sleep from which he may wake to find his soul in peril.

Lighten my eyes lest I sleep the sleep of death. (Ps. 13:3.)

thirty years ago by the farmer and is trying to arrange for an exploration in the success of which, he will have a share. There will be plenty of people ready to help him. It is a pity that there is not similar earnestness in the other search to which this is compared.

The kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field. (Matt. 13:44.)

Lions in the Cellar.

A startling discovery was made a few days ago by a farmer in Alameda County, California. Two weeks ago he moved into a new house that had not been occupied since it was built. He was busy for the first few days of his occupancy with his farm work, and his women folk were putting their furniture in place, putting down carpets and fixing the shades. There had been no occasion to go into the cellar. When things were getting straight, the farmer's wife opened the cellar door, intending to go down and explore, but a strange, unearthly noise frightened her away. She told her husband about it when he came in, and he took his gun and descended the stairs. He stood still for a moment peering around in the gloom. Suddenly a large California lioness bounded past him and ran up the stairs and away before he recovered his presence of mind sufficiently to shoot at her. The eyes of the lion could be seen glaring in the darkness. In another moment he, too, made a rush for the stairs, but the farmer, by this time, was on the alert. He fired and brought down one of the largest lions that has been seen in that section. A search of the cellar brought to light four fine cubs only a few days old. Very few men have had the thrilling experience of finding lions in their cellar, but it is common enough for men to discover in their lower nature enemies in their passions and propensities more to be dreaded than these fierce beasts.

The heart of the sons of men is full of evil and madness is in their heart while they live. (Eccles. 9:3.)

Titles for Sale.

A circular issued by a dealer in European titles, decorations, etc., has found its way to the office of the New York Sun. The document, as published by that journal, is in the style of an ordinary trade prospectus, but the commodities it offers are not of the kind generally regarded as articles of purchase and sale. The dealer is prepared to do business with persons wishing to be made barons, counts or baronets. He guarantees to raise to the nobility any person who will pay him specified sums, ranging from five hundred dollars to fifteen thousand. The lowest price is for an Italian title of the lowest class. A baronetcy, also Italian, is offered for fifteen hundred, and the highest prices are for the titles of count and baron from central European lands. The decorations offered are Turkish, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Austrian and German. They range from the Turkish Order of the Medjidie, which costs seven hundred dollars, to the Austrian Knight's Cross of the Order of the Iron Crown, which costs fifteen thousand dollars. The dealer frankly explains that he has not these orders and titles in his possession, and therefore cannot sell them. Only reigning princes can confer them. But the dealer professes to be able, by secret means which he does not explain, to influence these reigning princes so that they will confer them on his patrons. The sums required are to be regarded as payments for exerting this influence, not as the cost of the patent of nobility or the decoration. That the offer is genuine may be inferred from the fact that no money is to be paid until the title or decoration is secured. The transaction is therefore practically a purchase. This shows that money has power to obtain entrance to a sphere which it has been usually supposed was reserved exclusively for merit. If people are willing to spend their money in that way no great harm is done, but it is important to remember that the highest nobility of all—the nobility of heaven can never be gained by money, although the attempt has been made:

Thy money perish with thee because thou hast thought that the gift of God can be purchased with money. (Acts 8:20.)

BURMAH AND ITS PEOPLE.

A Land of Old Customs and Slow Changes —Woman and Her Position.

CHANGES occur slowly in the Orient. Travelers passing through eastern lands at the present day find very little difference in dress, customs and general appearance from what other travelers found a century before. Burmah, sometimes called the Empire of Ava, is one of the most conservative of oriental countries, and its people, who during the present century have come into closer contact with western civilization than at any time in their previous history, still cling almost universally to the old established conventional usage in dress manners, language, and belief. Buddhism is the prevailing religion, and it finds its highest expression in this peculiar land, whose people are priest-ridden to a great degree. It is a land of priests and temples, and the chief part of the education of its youth consists in the teaching of Buddhist formulas and maxims. Until the English obtained control, it was the universal custom for every boy, on leaving school, to take the "yellow robe"—the first step of qualification for the priestly office. Since the introduction of western educational methods and government schools, a considerable proportion of the children are permitted to follow the new order of education, and thus the Buddhist monasteries are deprived of many promising young novices.

Although the Burmans are Mongols, they have nothing in common with the characteristic Mongol traits, as they are found among the Chinese. They are somewhat diminutive in stature and flat-faced, with black hair, and skin of a brownish color, and with a pleasant expression and a soft, euphonious language of monosyllables. They dress very simply, the tu-gene, a white linen jacket, being common to both sexes. A garment called the put so, several yards long, is worn by the men, wrapped around the lower part of the body, while the women wear a thin gossamer-like fabric of silk or wool. Ladies of wealth are extremely fond of rich dresses, and the costume of those who belong to the titled class is often such as would appear in western eyes to be little less than a mass of frippery and ornamentation.

Our photograph of a young lady of rank is a very fair type of the dress of the higher class in Burmese society. Among the peasants, however, the costume is usually very simple, and of the cheapest material. As a race, the men are well made and fond of athletics, and the mechanics and other industrial workers are very skilful. Like the Japanese, the Burmese are a merry people, and delight in festivals and public entertainments. Much time is spent in amusement; but they are extremely industrious, the women buying, selling, weaving, and attending to household duties, and the men keeping busy at their different avocations. They are temperate and hardy, but somewhat quick-tempered. As a nation, they have little patriotism, and are deficient in that courage which goes to make brave soldiers and patriotic defenders. They would rather be left alone to pursue the even tenor of their simple lives in the rice fields or among their oxen, than called to shine either on fields of war or diplomacy.

Burmese architecture is one of the marvels of the East. Their temples and monasteries are even beautiful in design and remarkable in execution. One of the finest groups of buildings ever devoted to the use of religion is the Royal Monastery near Mandalay, where, as a distinguished writer has said, "Every building is magnificent, every inch carved with the ingenuity of a Chinese toy, and the whole ablaze with gold-leaf and looking-glass." Pagodas, shrines and temples appear everywhere. At Rangoon is a temple of beautiful design, which is declared to contain eight hairs of Buddha. It has a multitude of bells, staircases, decorations, and carvings, and is a popular shrine, especially on the great feast days, when many thousands gather to present gifts to the gods. A strange thing about this idol-worship is that the idols are usually perishable, being made of wood, and rarely of metal.

Social life in Burmah has its peculiarities. Marriage is not a religious ceremony, but funerals are the occasion of a great deal of monkish display and activity. Until very recently, cremation was the most popular form of disposing of the dead.

The Flowers of May.

May is the first real month of blossoms. Though there may be a few in April, it is in the month dedicated to Flora that the old earth puts on her best hues and flashes resplendent in her finery of blue and white, yellow and crimson. The tender little mayflowers that we gather in our woods have their counterpart in the hawthorn of England, where it was customary during the middle ages for all both high and low—even the Court itself—to go out on the first of May morning at an early hour "to fetch the flowers fresh." Hawthorn branches were also gathered; and were brought home about sunrise, with accompaniments of horn and tabor, and all possible signs of joy and merriment. With these the people decorated the doors and windows of their houses. By a natural transition of ideas, they gave the hawthorn bloom the name of the "May;" they called the ceremony "the bringing home the May," and spoke of the expedition to the woods as "going a-Maying." In our own country, within the recollection of many now living, school excursions and picnics occurring in the month of May were called "going a-Maying."

Pity for Dumb Creatures.

A subscriber in Newbern, Va., sends us this note in answer to L. K. L., of Ozeand, Va., whose letter we recently published. L. K. L. inquired how many of our readers would help in trying to prevent God's dumb creatures being mistreated:

I will plead for them as long I have breath. My prayer often is: "Oh, great and merciful Lord, soften the hearts of all thy people so that it will be impossible for them to cruelly treat any living creature." It makes my heart ache when I think how people are treating the poor cattle for a little gam, robbing them of the horns the Lord gave them, and in such a cruel way. May their moan and bellowing be a prayer to God for the arresting of their wrongs. I will also plead for the horse. After being faithfully served by it through the years of its usefulness, when it has, through old age, become no longer profitable, they sell the horse to some very poor person who they know will half starve it. No one, if I understand the teachings of the Bible aright, can claim to be charitable who withholds charity from even the least of God's creatures. May the dear Lord raise up many such true and noble

ANOTHER FLOWER CLOCK

SOMETIME ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published a letter from a reader abroad, in which it was made of a wonderful garden flowers were so chosen and arranged and opened and shut with such precision as to serve as a clock. Now comes into of another "floral time-piece," which is being planned by Instructor Ous of the Botanical Division, University of California, at Berkeley, Cal. Mr. hout proposes to cultivate his garden in the university grounds, arranging plants in dial form. The hours of the day are to be indicated by the opening and closing of buds. "The work of producing such a clock will be a task, and a great deal of planning will be necessary to find out what flowers should be put around the circle to indicate time. The garden will be the only one of the kind in the States. By getting the right varieties of flowers we can mark all the hours of the day, and some of the half hours too. The flowers will be arranged like a clock, and in the morning they would begin to open, and the different varieties at different periods according to the light and heat. Gradually the opening flowers would extend around the circle, until at night the circle would be all in bloom. The first garden of the kind was at Upsala, Sweden, where the botanist Linnaeus. There, one in Paris, and efforts have been made to cultivate them in the United States, but owing to the climate they have not been very successful. I think the California climate is well adapted for such an experiment."

White House Souvenirs.

Before leaving the White House, Mrs. Cleveland, always mirroring her friends, looked over the collection of articles that had been sent to her during her years of occupancy. Chief among the gifts were people who live in the country. Among the gifts were bed-quilts, the "crazy" pattern, which had been taken years to sew and embroider rag carpets, one of them made of pieces of clothing, worn by several generations of the same family, and woolen panels depicting religious scenes, and a host of similar things are strewn about, each and every one showing much kindly thought. Mrs. Cleveland says that all the kind will be treasured in the home of the family. Accompanying the gifts came many kindly letters, some them patriotic, others full of enthusiastic admiration, and all breathing the spirit of genuine good-will which cannot love to show to those who have so highly honored. The collection themselves would make a very interesting volume.

A Note of Spring.

A meadow swung on a blue stem blade—
Swung and sang while he merrily swayed
And this the burden of his song,
Spring has come! Spring has come!
A prairie dog peeped from his house that day
Sniffed the air, then heard the lay,
And told Mrs. Owl as she droned along,
The wonderful news that spring had come!
A violet raised her pale blue head,
Nodded and smiled and cheerily said
To her neighbor dandelion, looking forth
"Cheer up, dear sister, the spring has come!"
What though the heart without looked sad
The heart within was merry and glad,
And all who that day heard the song,
Felt cheered and happy for spring had come.

friends as Mrs. L. K. L., to speak for those who cannot speak for themselves.

A Helpmeet Indeed!

An exchange relates this interesting incident: On a recent Sunday, a Brooklyn pastor found himself suffering from a severe cold. His voice grew more and more husky as he proceeded, and at length, after struggling with the impediment unsuccessfully, he stopped in the middle of his discourse and said: "I shall be obliged to ask my wife to finish my sermon for me." As she came up into the pulpit he pointed out the place in his manuscript which he had reached and, turning to his congregation, exclaimed: "My wife has not read the manuscript, but I think she can get along with it." She gracefully completed the discourse in a clear, firm voice, notwithstanding the sudden emergency and the unusual position; after which her husband came back into the pulpit to conclude the services of the morning, saying as he did so, "A friend in need is a wife indeed"—a felicitous benediction to which the congregation must have wished to say "Amen."

FRUIT-BEARING.

Mysterious Union of the Divine Nature
With the Human the Source of Power and service in Christ's Cause.

How much of the mystery of life remains to be discovered, is not known to the wisest among us. During the past half century more has been learned about it than in many previous centuries.

The whole aspect and perspective have changed and clues are now in our hands which may lead to results altogether unimagined. This much, however, may be predicted: a new light will come from those wonderful words (John 1:9), some of the most wonderful mysteries that Christ uttered while on earth. There is undoubtedly a meaning in them that as yet we cannot grasp, but practically we have learned something of its working. We have seen by many a mortifying failure that a glorious triumph, that benediction and us there is, in some inexorable way, a communication of power is the power and life that the vine sends its branches. Separated from self-confidence, by self-reliance, or by sin, neither logic nor eloquence nor the most approved methods are successful. Joined with him, relying solely upon him, the weak and most common-place instruments can do what we wonder at the success that a simple unadorned talk; we are able to see souls brought to Christ by teaching that seems feeble, illogical, puerile, while eloquence and eloquence prove ineffective. The explanation here. The branch abiding in the vine bears fruit. How one life can be another, we know not, but Christ would we see that it is so. Life is a simple and complicated thing we have yet perceived and there are vast possibilities that as yet we have not grasped. Christ as the source of life and power is a momentous fact. We are yet to come spiritual life beyond our present conception.

There is encouragement here for weak souls. Battling with temptation, struggling with pollution to be pure, striving for impotence to tell to others what is to us and what he may be to make grow impatient with our own weakness. But with his life flowing into our spiritual being as the sap of the vine passes into the branches, let us say we not do, what height of spiritual attainment may we not hope to reach. See what power we will wield in our prayer: "Ye shall ask what ye will and it shall be done unto you." There is no restriction. The one condition that we abide in him and the one condition in him is to keep his commandments. To do this we must resign ourselves which is dear to the human heart. We will must be given up: we shall be will but his. Many pleasures are renounced: we cannot take his life into the theatre and the ballroom. We cannot "push to the front;" he bade us take the lowest place. We cannot stand up for our rights: he sends us not to resist injury. It seems that we give up our lives: what loathes his life shall save it. The weakest and poorest of us can do this and can abide in the vine.

There is no Sunday service, no occasional intermittent connection, but a constant and perpetual union. There is a communion of sacred and secular life, affection and perfect loyalty pervading all our lives, we walk in business, social life and in the home as one. To be like him—that is the true object and purpose of our being, which we are ready to sacrifice all for, it is more than that. The union is not an imitation. It is his life that we live. The branch has no independent life. How this sanctifies even the meanest duty. Everything is done by his name and in his name. Thus his life in the world became perpetual. The world is in every good work that is done by his people. It is his life that they live, not for their own, and out of it, as in the days of flesh, come the healing and the blessing and the transformation of the world. This brings perfect peace and a new life connected with him as the branch in the vine we bear fruit.

HARK, POOR INDIA!

HARK, poor India's Bitter wailing!

Hear her mournful cry,
"Give us bread, for we are starving;
Help us or we die!"

'Tis a voice that calls in the solemn night
From over the rolling deep;
'Tis a voice that calls through the hours of light
While angels watch and weep.

Hark, poor India's bitter wailing!

Sadly, longingly,
Many millions are appealing
Unto you and me.

Were the Master here would we turn from Him
In his hour of misery?
"Inasmuch as ye did it unto them
Ye did it unto Me."

In His Name as sons and daughters
Of our Heavenly King,
Let us send across the waters
Some sweet offering.
Be it princely gift or the widow's mite
Yon ebbing life 'twill stay,
Till India's cloud shall turn to light,
Her shadows roll away.

BY W. MAUDE.

It is obvious from the considerations mentioned in the previous article on this subject, that there is to be a period, during which commerce is to rule the earth—a period when an ephah might fitly be emblazoned on the banner of each kingdom of the Roman world as the device best suited to indicate where the secret of its influence lay. "This said the angel in allusion to the ephah, "This is their eye," i. e. this is that to which they have an eye—the object on which their attention rests—"in all the earth." "This ephah is that towards which all those who dwell in the land look with longing eyes. Wherever thieves and perjured persons are to be found throughout the land, and in all the earth, their eyes are ever to weights and measures, their whole thoughts are turned towards the acquisition of earthly gain." "This is their eye through all the earth."

At first the ephah, it would seem, was all that the prophet beheld, and in this there was nothing either to startle or alarm; on the contrary, it presented a very pleasing and reassuring appearance as contrasted with the other more familiar forms of earthly power. The sceptre of the king, the sword of the warrior, the mitre of the priest, all these men have long learned, by bitter experience, to dread; but the reign of commerce promises the development of the earth's resources for the benefit of humanity, the cessation of war, as that which above all else interferes with its advancement, and the friendly intercourse of nation with nation. Such is man's thought, and hence we are continually hearing trade eulogised as the great civilizer and benefactor of the human race, while its image is ever represented upon a cornucopia, out of which the fruits of the earth are pouring forth, and bearing in her hand the olive branch of peace.

While the prophet's eye was yet fixed, in a kind of terrible fascination, upon the mysterious woman seated in the ephah, he suddenly beheld "a talent of lead"—a heavy circular plate of that metal—lifted up in the angel's hand, from which it presently descended, crushing down the woman into the interior of the ephah, and, by closing its mouth, imprisoning her within it. What are we to learn from this? Two things, at least, it seems intended to teach us.

First, we may learn from it that when there is "wickedness" in trade it is hidden under a specious appearance. It does not proclaim its lawlessness; on the contrary, it presents itself to those who view it from without under an aspect of utility and even of beneficence. It is the patron of science, the nurse of art, the employer of labor, the civilizer of the dark places of the earth, even the pioneer of religion.

Secondly, the imprisonment of the woman in the ephah seems designed to teach us the solemn truth that this "wickedness" is inseparable from the trade system as it now exists and will be more fully developed in the world. The thought may naturally have passed the mind of the reader of the preceding pages, "But all trading is not necessarily thus evil; every man engaged in trade is not a rogue." Assuredly not. I am speaking of the system—the prophet's vision has reference to the system—not to the individuals.

Moreover, the evil of the system has not yet culminated. The system itself, as the vision plainly indicates, is formed secretly, for it is represented as hidden in the ephah. "And nothing," says Mr. Newton, "can be more true. Sheltering itself under the excuse of expediency, England, which more than any nation owns the sway of the ephah, has secretly and stealthily adopted principles which it is still ashamed to avow as the fixed acknowledged rules of its conduct. Many a sentiment has dropped from the lips of legislators and statesmen, and acted on, has not become one of the recognized principles of the State."

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

CHAPTER XI—Concl.
Steve is Wanted.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

Jessie was clever enough to make good her own standing; to gradually render herself almost indispensable. She lifted so many little cares, did so much necessary shopping, saw people whom Mrs. Lloyd and Alice did not wish to see, wrote notes of ceremony, etc., etc., and day by day so encroached on everyone's duties, that the keys of the Lloyd mansion, figuratively speaking, fell absolutely into her hands. And through all these changes Steve was becoming daily more and more infatuated with his wife's beauty and cleverness, and more and more subject to her influence and control.

It must, however, be admitted that Jessie's rapid accession to power was greatly aided by Alice's careless abrogation of it. The unhappy girl was walking through the Valley of Humiliation, and it is a fact, that most of us prefer to take that lowly road without witnesses. After her interview with Mr. Rives she had written a few sad but positive words to Lord Medway, releasing both of them from an engagement that seemed so allied to misfortune and disappointment; and the young man had accepted his "unhappy destiny" without any gainsaying. Across that chapter of her life she had written "finished," and she knew that it was finished. She knew, also, that she had done right; but an approving conscience does not relieve or release from consequences. These have been created, and must be borne; and it is well for us that there is no release from them. Such experiences bring the sweet austerity of sacrifice, and that serenity of submission which is the harvest-song of inward peace. Alice had not yet attained unto this excellent condition, but she was slowly following after it. On the bread of bitterness, she was growing to her full stature; and then one day, this thing happened to her.

Another nurse was needed very urgently. Steve could not leave his father; Jessie was out for the day, and Mrs. Lloyd asked Alice to go to a certain address near Chelsea Square. "I have seen the man, and he is very suitable," she said; "and I could write for him, but if you will take the carriage, and drive to his home, we shall have him here some hours earlier."

"I will go at once, Mother," she answered, and she did so. Having finished her errand, she was driving past the Theological Seminary in that locality; and the quaint, vine-covered building, which she had never seen before, arrested her attention. "It is like a corner from some old English Cathedral town," she thought; "such a bit of beauty, and rest, and peace, near the river, is simply wonderful." And as she gazed, she saw several men and women, with prayer books in their hands, enter the building. Her message was delivered, her curiosity was aroused; nay, it was something wiser and more potent than mere curiosity; it was that warm impression of the soul, to which we give the name of presentiment, that whispered to her "go in and be comforted."

She bid the coachman wait for her, and followed the two's and three's through the gateway, into a lovely little chapel. The organ was prelude the service in a nobly majestic invocation, and ere it was finished, a large orderly body of young men filed into the stalls, and knelt in prayer. The little congregation bowed with them, then came the officiating pastor, and his sweet clear voice filled the whole space, with those pathetic entreaties, with which sinful men best approach their Maker:

"Hide thy face from my sins, and blot out all my iniquities."

"The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit, a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgiveness, though we have rebelled against him.

"O Lord correct me, but with judgment; not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing."

"I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, before thee and am no more worthy to be called thy son."

Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee and am no more worthy to be called thy son."

Music and Intercession, the thrilling march of young men, singing, "The Lord is a man of War," the pathos, and the calm assurance of the responses—the verbal music of the pastor's noble reading of the noblest words in the language, all these went to Alice's heart, and melted its frost with infinite tenderness; and watered it, with the rain of sorrowful tears; and filled it, with the joy of believing.

"My dear Lord God!" she prayed, "Take me to the rest of Thy Will be Done." Then she was comforted. She rose with the congregation, and the sweet music of the Benediction fell upon her heart. She had accepted, and she had been accepted; and she went back to her home, literally a changed woman. God had spoken a word to her. Is any one ever the same after that wondrous experience?

Who that one moment, hath the least desisted Him,
Dimly and faintly, hidden and afar,
Doth not despise all excellence beside Him,
Pleasures and powers, that are not, and that are?

CHAPTER XII.

The Church of the Future.

The experience which does not make us better, makes us worse; and there was in Jessie's case a constant disintegration of character. She had obtained the uttermost desire of her vain, ambitious heart; and she considered this result to be the fruit of her own tact and superior wisdom. No credit was given to the force of circumstances; none to her husband's love; none to the unselfish tolerance of Mrs. Lloyd and Alice. She believed that she had forced the position, and she prided herself on her strategy and sagacity.

All the long, dreary winter she held firmly the reins of the Lloyd household, and she was never weary of pointing out to Steve how cleverly she did so. And as Steve was not accustomed to look

A Cure For Rheumatism

DR. J. G. CONNER, IONIA, MICH., writes:

Dear Sirs:—An old friend of mine handed me a couple of small vials of Tartaric acid some time ago and I used it on myself, having suffered from rheumatism for several years. I was so pleased with its effects that I ordered a full sized bottle, and since that time I have been entirely free from rheumatism during the past year. I have observed that it is not surpassed by any other preparation as a prompt and efficient diuretic; besides it is pleasant to the taste. Please send me a few bottles for use among my patients suffering with Rheumatism.

the surface of events, he was and delighted with Jessie's social life. He even began to have some for a society that was capable of creating and endorsing his idea of a woman and a desirable wife. Jessie, after all, ruled only because of the circumstances. Mrs. Lloyd's stung watch by her husband's side for no time for either domestic or duties, and Alice bore this burden in measure with her.

which Alice had trouble which peculiarly her own. Soon after Christmas began to be reports of a marriage between Miss Leavenworth and Lord Medway. Some papers averred this case, and others as positively asserted that the engagement between Miss and Lord Medway was still in force, the marriage only delayed by the illness of the bride's father. Reporters after by requests for an interview, and acquaintances hinted or spoke on the subject; there were still stirrings from distant friends of congratulations, or wedding gifts, and the unmarried girl was thankful to escape from contact with a world that at this time had nothing but annoyances to offer. No one could deny that Jessie filled the place she had taken with great success. She dressed to it with taste and grace; she understood the servants well, and made them fulfill their duties and do the last tittle of their work, and she won for herself a very real adherence and admiration among the acquaintances of the Lloyd family. Making friends with the mammon righteousness, as John would say, he laughingly told Steve, "when we have our own house again my visiting list will be with the best in the city." And he had not the courage to oppose this idea. He thought it would be so wait until there was a proposition to make it.

As Good Friday dawned this unusual condition of family affairs was to its climax. Alice was awakened by her mother out of a deep sleep, and saw that on her face, which needed explanation, "Go back to him," she uttered, "and I will be with you in five minutes." Then she drew up the blind in the pale grey light, and as she felt the miserable influence of the sunset, then saddening the skies, and the crack of clouds driven onward by the wind. Insensibly, she was terrified for the living soul, and as she put on some things she began to pray. Her words full of the stress and hurry of the parting hour, and as she hastened up the dim way to the death room she could but move over and over with a constantly increasing intensity "Lord Jesus! save him in my mercy's sake!"

The end was close at hand, the silver binding the mortal to immortality loosened. Nicholas Lloyd was drifting idly beyond the reach or ken of any love. Whether he was conscious of his departure or not it was impossible to determine. His wide open eyes were a sombre gloom and pitifully restless. He was evidently imploring some stratification. Steve understood this, and watched him with a reluctance and sorrow that was inexpressible. "Mother," he whispered, "I know what he wants. I'll give him it?" She looked her assurance rather than spoke, and Steve took from his pocket some bank bills, and put them into the fingers that were already the dying man was no longer able to hold and finger them. His last earthly consolation had departed. It was a prelude to death. Perhaps he then, for the first time realized it, but speech was gone. He looked with awful inquiry into Steve's eyes, and then became suddenly still. A serene calmness, a terrible desolation marked that last hour, and the faces of those that loved him were filled with dread and sadness.

This last solemn journey of the freed soul was accompanied and followed by prayer and prayer. Wherever its course led it took with it the implorations of the souls that believed and trusted in the infinite, illimitable mercy of God. "Oh, Alice," said Alice to her mother, "the which has begun with man's forgetfulness will be crowned with God's forgiveness. Father himself will now see right and wrong with the eyes of immortality. Do you think his soul will cease to pray when it has left the body? Perhaps, dear mother, it may now pray with a stronger and deeper sense of its need."

"Oh, Alice, if I could only think thus!" "Is it not better, mother, to trust God too much than too little? May we not plead for a man with God as man pleadeth for his neighbor?"

"My doubts are great." "My faith is beyond all doubts, for it rests on the love of God, and who shall separate us from that love, height nor depth, nor any other thing," and her face shone and her assertion had all the conclusiveness of an intuition.

"But we are taught, Alice." "Ah, mother! I have come to believe that nothing goes to heaven but love, and that love can open the kingdom of heaven to all who pray at its gates. Any way we will not despair. Dr. Robertson says 'that is the unpardonable sin and a heavier weight than all the sins committed.'"

Alice knew of what she was speaking. She had arrived at that point where the satisfied soul can be glad for "the good time when it was unhappy." Her days of affliction and disappointment had been turned into days of silence and prayer, flowing on like drops from the honey-comb: a spiritual joy utterly incomprehensible to the pride of drudging souls sworn to mammon: a spiritual faith founded on that tender revelation—God is love. Therefore she believed the anger of God to be but for a moment, and his pity to be eternal. He had commanded us to love our enemies, and she could not believe that he would disobey his own command. On her knees she humbly tried to hope that mercy might be shown even to one who had so slighted and disdainfully used the infinite loving-kindness.

Now, if perfume be sprayed into a room it may not be visible to the eye, but we are sensible of its presence, and so this element of hope in God's mercy lifted the intolerable gloom of despair and made it possible for the living to endure the stress of days and nights that held no other hope. For the home—in which Nicholas Lloyd had been the pervading thought—in a very few days knew him no more. All tokens of his suffering presence were removed, his very name was unspoken. Dead and buried, who is so soon forgotten as the merely rich man? His gold is his no longer, and he has nothing else to leave. There were a few paragraphs about the dead millionaire in the daily papers—an account of the funeral—and then oblivion—nothing, not even pity or regret.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

THE HEROISM OF FAITH.

R. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, the well-known Evangelist, belongs to the roll of honor on which is inscribed the modern "Heroes of the Faith." Dr. Chapman's dominant characteristic is the heroic quality of his faith. He firmly believes that God is able and willing, at any moment, to save any man rich or poor, family had been broken up through his sin, and he had led as dissolute a life as one could possibly follow. All his earnings were spent in the saloons—he was profane, and sinful in fact in almost every way common to man. People who knew him thought him hardly worth saving, and so he had been practically forsaken by Christians.

Dr. Chapman was holding revival meetings in Greenbush, just across the river from Albany, N. Y. One evening John Pearl was sitting in a saloon, when some one said: "Chapman is preaching in the Presbyterian Church to-night." This arrested Pearl's attention, and he said: "I'll go and hear him." The bystanders laughed at the idea of old John Pearl going to church, but he started out. When he reached the church his courage failed him. He said to himself: "No one will want me. I am nothing but a poor drunkard. I am dirty and almost in rags." And so he hurried away to the saloon. But God would not let him go, and he was soon back again at the church door, and almost before he knew it, he was in the church and in the second pew from the front. For a part of the service he seemed stupefied; then he began to give the truth his attention, and when the invitation was given his was the first hand lifted, and in the after meeting he was the first to fall upon his knees, and there God met him, and he was wonderfully converted.

John Pearl became a member of the church, and has been a faithful, loyal follower of Jesus Christ ever since. Only once has he been tempted to drink. One day the devil made a dead set for his soul. It seemed as if the tiger thirst for strong drink would drive him wild, but like Joseph in Potiphar's palace, he fled from the face of his temptation, and going home he cried unto God for deliverance. His cry was heard, and from that day until this he has been entirely free from the appetite for strong drink. His life seems to flow on as sweetly and securely as if he had never known thirteen years of misery and wretchedness.

I have chosen these two cases, standing in such strong contrast, out of the thousands of men who have been led to Christ through the charming brotherliness and heroic faith of Dr. Chapman's ministry.

Babylonian Tablets.

Prof. Prince, of New York University, announces that its Semitic department has received a valuable gift of 204 ancient Babylonian tablets, which were found at Tello, in Southern Babylonia in 1895. The most important is a black baked-clay cylinder, inscribed in old Babylonian characters, which is in practically perfect condition, and can only be matched in the Louvre collections, which came from the same site. Prof. Hilprecht, of the University of Pennsylvania, says that it must date back as far as 3,000 B. C. Prof. Prince will publish the inscription as soon as possible.

Have You Asthma or Hay-Fever?

Medical Science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma and Hay-fever in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that it cured him of Asthma of fifty years' standing, and Hon. L. C. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that for three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair in Hay-fever season, being unable to lie down night or day. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To make the matter sure, these and hundreds of other cures are sworn to before a notary public. So great is their faith in its wonderful curative powers, the Kola Importing Co., of 167 Broadway, New York, to make it known, is sending out large cases of the Kola compound free to all readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are sufferers from Asthma. All they ask in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. Send your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large case by mail free. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

Don't you know that nearly everyone needs a good medicine at this season? And don't you know that Hood's Sarsaparilla is the great blood purifier and health restorer?

learned or ignorant, and instantly transform him from a penitent sinner to a righteous saint. A great many people profess to believe that, but when a man really does believe it, and goes about the world living up to his faith, he is a hero.

Dr. Chapman has great success in reaching men. He is such a simple, straightforward, manly man himself, that men believe in him at first glance. At a young men's meeting in Saginaw, Mich., two or three years since, Dr. Chapman was urging men to an immediate decision for Christ. Colonel Bliss, an ex-member of Congress, and one of the wealthiest and most influential citizens of the State had but just entered the room, when the impassioned appeal of the evangelist, "Do it now! Do it now!" fell on his ears. With a sudden impulse, making a decision on the instant, Colonel Bliss arose and simply said, "I will." The whole question of his salvation was settled. The battle he had been waging for years was won. Before a great assemblage of men in Detroit, a few weeks later, he gave this testimony:

"I was deeply convicted in my early life—but the war came on. I enlisted and stifled my convictions for the time being. Then I was taken prisoner, and determined that if I was only released I would be a Christian. My release came, and I said, I will wait till the war is ended—and that came to pass, and I was still undecided. Then I said I must give my attention to business, and after I have made a competency I will be a Christian. I achieved that, but I still delayed. Every day it seemed to grow more difficult, and I had almost lost hope. My conversion seemed an impossibility. But one night I heard Dr. Chapman say the three words, 'Do it now.' And I said that is a message for me, and with a tremendous effort I stood up and said, 'I will.' In me hardly I received a blessing. God certainly revealed himself to me, and from that day I have been more than happy. And 'revelation,' he said to the five thousand men present, 'if you would have the easiest time—the safest time—in fact, God's time to be saved, I repeat the words, 'Do it now!'"

Colonel Bliss has been a most devoted enthusiastic Christian ever since.

A very different man was John Pearl, who for thirteen years had scarcely drawn a single breath, and for the same length of time had not been in the church, except occasionally to attend a funeral. His

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Nature's Nerve Tonic and a Powerful Restorative in Nervous Dyspepsia. A Miserable Dyspeptic Eats "Hog and Hominy."

Statement of Dr. L. M. WOOD, of Wyandotte, Kansas.

"I first saw Mrs. —, a woman of large frame, but greatly enervated, laboring under Hysterical Coma, from which she had not been sufficiently aroused to take nourishment for four days. From her husband I obtained the following history of her case:—

"She had been previously in robust health and lead an active, laborious life, doing all the work for the household. For several years, however, she had been a sufferer from a severe form of Dyspepsia, her stomach often rejected the lightest articles of diet. For some time she had been subject to occasional attacks of Coma, increasing in frequency and duration. Under appropriate treatment there was a return of sensibility and consciousness, and she took nourishment, but there was no permanent improvement of the general health; and a recurrence of the Coma. Recalling the opinion expressed by Dr. Hunter McGuire, that was a 'Powerful Nervous Tonic,' I put her upon it. The result was gradual, decided improvement in the digestive trouble, and in a few months she was able to eat heartily and digest readily almost any article of diet. At the same time the nervous symptoms were relieved and she is now in robust health, doing as much hard work and eating as much 'Hog and Hominy' as any woman in the West."

Moving and House Cleaning

MAY-DAY which comes up just before us is not all over the country the formidable and important anniversary which it is in the neighborhood of New York. Here and in adjacent cities it is commonly accepted as a period when people flit from one home to another—sometimes to improve their environment, quite often without much gain either in comfort or convenience. There are of course, even in our towns, many people who own homes and remain in them with the year after year; other people, having selected an abode, dislike giving up the nest, which moving and still others who endure ceremonies with comparative fortitude should change the state and keep

There is likewise a great host among us who are practically nomadic and do not mind in the least pulling down their tent and pitching them again around the next corner across the town. It is not very difficult to pick up one's belongings and move from one flat to another; and if you exchange dark rooms for sunny ones, satisfactory plumbing for that which is in order, a disagreeable neighborhood for a pleasant one; if that is all the consideration, the rent, is to be reduced by a change, many householders do not mind in the least the labor and hardship undergone, even if there still be truth in the old proverb that three removes are as good as a new one. Indeed for sheer wasting and extravagance I think one remove can hold its own against other ills of fate.

At the watched this spring the burdened householders who plod along the streets with their trunks, boxes, bureaus, tables, carpets, and books, and all sorts of furniture, strapped and tied in great loads, and wondering whether people who love their things can bear to have them thus exposed to the public gaze, may be amazed at the pace of the period when it now finds itself, yet nothing more than it from its own quiet work—it keeps on ticking forever, never, for ever, just as it has done for a long time.

The effect on children who are growing up and allowed to live in one home without a change is certainly very marked. They require steadfastness, their minds are invaded by interruption, and they live in the tranquil air of one simple habitation. It is much to be doubted if the young people are gainers by such a shifting from church to church, from school to school; whether they would not be the whole too much better under a steady regime; and in all our moving and settling it is to be accounted whether the change is to help or hinder the progress of the stability of the neighboring churches and schools. A church can be very much injured by the leaving of several families who will do no better in another place and who were useful in that place. If we do go, let us go with a determination of helpfulness in the new home.

It may be well sometimes for us to decide whether moving or not we will move to a better or a poorer neighborhood. The statistics in college settlements tell us that the way in which what we are wont to call the "slums" will ever be redeemed lies through the settling down in and living among them of quiet, well-conducted and comfortably living people. Of course it requires much self-denial to make up one's mind deliberately to go and dwell among those who are entirely ungentlemanly and whose modes of life are not like ours, but there are those who are willing to do this for Christ's sake. Here again, if there are boys and girls to train, there should be wise consideration of their best interests. "Mine own vinegar have I not kept," is sometimes mournfully said by those whose care for others, leads to neglect of their own families.

Apart from the question of moving, the question of the spring house-cleaning impresses itself upon everybody. I have never yet known a man who thought that there was any reason to do this. To the uneducated eyes of our husbands and fathers, carpets never need shaking, closets never need administration, the house always looks clean, and the wonder always is why the mother must disturb the reigning peace by her brushes and brooms and whitewash and kalsomine, her new paper and paint. Still they rejoice, these dear, blundering men creatures, when the fuss is over and they settle down into quietly clean and beautiful homes again. With good management the house-cleaning may be so done that everything will not be upset at once, except in those occasional times when the painters and paper-hangers come in like an invading army. Then even the best contrivers must make up their minds for a siege and get along as best they can. Health and beauty walk hand in hand in our house-cleaning, and the May sunshine, when all the world is bright and nature has had her annual house-cleaning in March and April, is apparently the time for us to enter on our spring campaign. Take it by degrees, dear mothers and daughters. There is no occasion to rush around like a cyclone. Do not court pneumonia by rash exposure, and beware of hurry and flurry. One may as well move gently and speak softly in house cleaning days as in any other gala times.

New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.—Free to all Readers.

All readers will be glad to know that the new botanical discovery, Alkavis, has proved an assured cure for all diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or by disordered action of the Kidneys or urinary organs. It is a wonderful discovery, with a record of 1200 hospital cures in 30 days. It acts directly upon the blood and kidneys, and is a true specific, just as quinine is in malaria. Rev. W. B. Moore, D.D., of Washington, testifies in the New York Christian Witness that Alkavis completely cured him of Kidney and bladder disease of many years' standing. Many ladies also testify to its curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. So far the Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, are the only importers of this new remedy, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepared by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative powers.

BRONCHIAL ASTHMA.

DISEASES THAT KILL THOUSANDS WHOSE DEATHS ARE CHARGED TO CONSUMPTION.

Bronchitis most frequently has its beginning in a simple cold that settles on the lungs.

Sometimes it is an after result of an attack of the "Grip."

It is also caused and aggravated by dust in the air, that irritates the membranes of the bronchial tubes. That is why so many stonecutters die of Bronchitis and Consumption.

The sufferer from Bronchitis first has a slight cough. It may be but a brief and apparently trifling coughing spell in the morning. He has chilly sensations. Toward evening he is slightly feverish. When he works or walks rapidly, or goes upstairs, he gets short of breath easily. Sometimes he has a sense of tightness or oppression of the chest.

As the disease progresses he begins to raise thick, greenish yellow matter when he coughs. He has a hectic fever and night sweats, and loses flesh and strength rapidly. In time the sufferer dies of exhaustion or becomes a consumptive.

The symptoms of Bronchitis so closely resemble those of Consumption that probably two-fifths of the deaths credited in health records to Consumption are really deaths by Bronchitis.

To put it in plain, everyday language, Bronchitis is simply a soreness of the lungs. It is a local disease, pure and simple. It can be surely and speedily cured by local treatment, and by no other means. It cannot be cured by medicines introduced into the stomach or injected into the blood. To accomplish cure the medicine must be applied directly to the inflamed linings of the bronchial tubes.

Physicians have been unable to cure Bronchitis, because they discovered no way to apply healing remedies directly to the membranes of the bronchial tubes. They could not cut a man's lungs open and apply medicine in that way. They could not pour liquids down his windpipe without strangling him. They were forced to give it up and acknowledge their inability to successfully combat lung diseases.

It remained for Dr. Robert Hunter to discover a simple and effective method of applying the right remedies direct to the diseased surfaces of the bronchial tubes. Dr. Hunter's method consists of medicating the air which the patient breathes. By this common-sense device he treats the sore lungs or the sore bronchial tubes by direct medication, just as he would treat a sore throat or a sore eye.

By this method Dr. Hunter has cured and is now curing thousands of cases of all kinds of lung disease. When his treatment is thoroughly known and understood the senseless fear of Bronchitis and Consumption which people now have will cease.

One very common form of Bronchitis is Bronchial Asthma. It comes on in attacks of difficult breathing, attended by a WHEEZING SOUND and great OPPRESSION AND CONSTRICTION of the chest.

The cure of asthma by medicated air is generally rapid and permanent. The spasmodic attacks are prevented and the inflamed bronchial tubes, which cause them, healed. Immediate relief and radical cure is attained in almost every case of bronchial asthma. People suffering from shortness of breath have a hundredfold more certainty of cure by this treatment than by any other known to medical science.

Dr. Hunter has written a book on "Diseases of the Lungs and Throat," in which he describes the right method of treating Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Nasal Catarrh and all diseases of the lungs and air passages. He will send this book free to any reader of "The Christian Herald" who writes for it.

There are hundreds of thousands of people in this country who are threatened with Consumption by Bronchitis, whose lives would be saved by the reading of this book, which it only costs a penny postal to secure.

THE WOMAN'S WORK FOR CHRIST.

"The Door of Hope Union" and its Labors Among the Lost Girl of Many Cities—Thirty Homes Opened—A Glorious Record.

HERE is probably no class of Christian service beset by more difficulties and discouragements than that which has for its object the reclamation of the friendless and fallen girls of our great cities, yet there are few that can show more gratifying results where the efforts put forth have been conducted with a single eye to the salvation of souls. To this class belongs the Door of Hope Union, whose remarkable record as a soul-winning agency among the seemingly hopeless outcasts of society is given below. That a work of such magnitude and importance should have been the fruition of the efforts of one devoted Christian woman, who gave to the task her fortune, her energies and her whole life, is a most encouraging demonstration of the truth that the blessing rests upon those who give up everything for the Master's service, without counting the cost, and esteem the life too dear to be sacrificed for his sake.

After the founding of the Door of Hope, 102 East Sixty-first street, New York, on October 25, 1890, Mrs. E. M. Whittemore makes it less hard for her future career. There are exceptional cases where the girl is able to "live down" the wrong done without being removed. The principal aim of this Union was, by this united system of prayer, to keep in constant spiritual touch with one another. No restrictions are put upon the management of each separate Home or its workings.

Our illustrations in this issue show a number of the Homes in different parts of the country, and also present portraits of the founder and the respective managers. Home No. 1, which was opened Oct. 25th, 1890, is strictly a Faith Work, and with Home No. 2, in Tappan, N. Y., is under the personal supervision of the founder. The workers are never burdened regarding finances. As Mrs. Whittemore herself declares: "In a little over six years, God has bestowed on the work, in answer to prayer, over $51,000, never allowing any debt to occur, removing all mortgages, so that both Homes are free and clear, besides granting many hundred girls the opportunity of receiving religious instruction, numbers of whom are now rejoicing in a personal Saviour. Though the discouragements are great in all the Homes at times, the unanimous determination of the workers is to press forward and do their part in the salvation of all, leaving results with him who later on will reveal what they may be. Who can tell the value of one soul and what, when once redeemed, it may not accomplish? For instance, Delia, the 'Blue Bird of Mulberry Bend,' one of the lowest of creatures, the woman of a gang of thieves, when she accepted Christ, was enabled to win over a hundred souls to wanted to organize what has since become known as "The Door of Hope Union." During the past four years no less than thirty-one Homes have been opened under the name of "Doors of Hope." The purpose of this Union is simply to band together these shelters for the poor girls of the street, and, through the ministry of prayer and kindness, to enable the workers to do more effective service. A system of exchange has been introduced of those entrusted to the care of the various Homes, as it is sometimes wise to remove a girl as quickly as possible from all previous surroundings and former acquaintances when she is desirous of doing right. This plan him within eleven months. More than one member of that desperate gang is living a respectable and Christian life to-day. It is true, the number of those who continue to walk in newness of life constitutes but a small percentage of the whole, but we cannot estimate what may be accomplished for God by these reclaimed ones."

Home No. 3 was opened in Fort Wayne, Tex., by Mrs. Delia Collins, and was partially the outcome of a visit paid by her son to the New York "Door of Hope." He became deeply stirred at heart concerning the reclamation of the destitute

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Mrs. J. B. Sault ste Marie, Mich. Can a minister of the Gospel administer the Lord's Supper by right after he has resigned his pulpit and gone into the real estate business; especially when by doing so he keeps others away from the table of the Lord?

His rights in the case depend on the laws of the church in which the ceremony takes place. He should not officiate if the church has prohibited such a man as he from doing so. Apart from those laws, which he should observe for the sake of order, we see no objection to his administering the sacrament. Of course a Roman Catholic or a high churchman would be shocked, because he associates the idea of sacrifice with the ordinance and holds occult notions about it. But we can see no basis for them in the Bible. If you read the accounts of the institution of the ordinance given by the Evangelists you will see that Christ's idea was that of a simple, social meal in which the people who love him should join in token of their brotherhood in Christ and their common reverence for him. People who stay away from the Lord's table because the ordinance is administered by a man who earns his livelihood in honest business do not show their good sense.

Gnosco, Rochester, N. Y. How is a Christian to know what his special work is?

Providence opens the way for him to do it. Experience, too, is of some use. A man speedily learns what work he is best adapted for. If a man holds himself ready to do any kind of work that needs to be done, however humble, and does not strive to do the kind of work that will bring him honor and fame, he need not long be unemployed.

C. F. C., Elgin, Mich. Why do you never publish in your column on prophecy articles from men who believe that the Second Coming of Christ will be spiritual and not a personal actual coming?

Because we believe the view to be unscriptural. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is not an arena for discussion but a medium for the advocacy of doctrines which its editors believe to be true and a means of imparting information as to the methods adopted in various districts to advance the kingdom of Christ.

W. J. P., Carthage, Mo., and others. We quoted from another source in the matter to which you refer concerning President McKinley's attitude as to the Inaugural ball. It gives us pleasure to be able now to state that the surplus of several thousand dollars realized from tickets, etc., was distributed among a number of worthy Washington charities.

A. H. M., Luton, Ia. 1. What are the two immutable things referred to in Heb. 6:18? 2. I understand there is a new view of Abraham offering Isaac. What is it? Is it Scriptural? 3. Can Esther be an inspired book when the name of God is not in it?

1. The promise and the oath about which the author has been writing in the preceding issues. 2. That Abraham, living among people who offered their children in sacrifice, considered the idea of following their example and that in the act of killing his son the revelation came to him that God did not require it of him. In short that the suggestion was his own and did not proceed from God. This view cannot be regarded as scriptural if by that word you mean in the literal accuracy of the Book. (See Gen. 22:2). 3. The existence of God and his care for his people are taught as distinctly as if the name of God had been mentioned. The fasting often referred to and the king's displeasure on the critical night (6:1) would be understood by all Jewish readers to imply divine interposition.

The two topics, Fort de Peck, Havt. 1. Why do I not get a question? I don't to you some time ago have not seen answer. 2. Are tea, coffee and alcohol injurious? The system as stated by several cannot be. 3. Is it sinful to eat eggs which seem that God pronounced it an item.

It is impossible to answer more than about a sixth of the questions sent to us. If we discussed the whole of the paper to this department it would not be sufficient to answer all the questions which reach us in a week. In selecting those which we will answer we choose those which are likely to be of interest to other persons besides the person sending the questions. We choose also questions which, as often happens, are asked by several persons, being probably suggested by the Sunday School Lesson. We omit questions already put by other persons and answered recently; questions which would require a column to answer; questions of no practical utility, such as Biblical conundrums; argumentative questions asked for the sake of disputation; and finally questions which neither we nor any other person can answer, such as, "What were the names of the five brothers of Dives, mentioned Luke 16:28?" which some one asked us. 2. We do not know whether they are injurious. A physician could tell you his opinion which would be worth more than ours. We cannot see how there can be sin in using them. 3. It was ceremonially unclean and there were special reasons for prohibiting it at that time and in that land; but the Gentiles were not required to observe the dietary laws except in two cases, and even those it is believed, were not permanent.

The little children have helped India nobly. We have many letters concerning their loving labors in behalf of the famine-stricken ones in referred to her as "the queen of south." The Arabs call her by various names, viz: Bilkis, Velkamah, or Balkamah, and an edifice at Marib bears her name while "Almacah" or "Balmacah" appear in Himeyerite inscriptions.

Mrs. Lucy B. Decatur, Mich., writes:

I heartily endorse your editorials on a purer press. The majority of political papers are unfit for family reading and defile the young and old alike. The shameful accounts of prize-fights and other indecent things that are published are a disgrace. How our hearts almost stand still in sympathy with brave little Greece, with Cuba, America, India! Your paper is indispensable to us.

Conscience, Centralia. I owe a party about $3, and don't know where he is and where I could find him. I would like to make restitution. Can I do it by giving it to the famine sufferers?

No; such an act would not be restitution and would be displeasing in God's sight. You should endeavor by every means in your power, to find the person or his representative and pay the money to those to whom it rightfully belongs.

C. W. L., Ash Ridge, Wis. Is the doctrine of the second work of grace, which is advocated by many people, a true Scriptural teaching?

We should be assuming an unwarrantable authority if we answered your question categorically. Brethren whom we honor and who are undoubtedly sincere believe that it is Scriptural. Who are we, that we should say it is not? We can only give you our opinion which you must take for what it is worth. Our belief then, is that sanctification is a gradual process, lasting all through our lives; that we are always receiving new light, new strength to overcome temptation and new grace to live more like Christ. We believe that at no time is it safe to relax our vigilance and that the time never comes when we attain absolute perfection, or immunity from the possibility of falling into sin. We believe that progress in the divine life is not uniform in its rate, but under favorable circumstances such as a seatainly he may be saved if he sincerely repents and seeks forgiveness through Christ. He must resolutely put away his sin. God not forgive him while he continues in it. There is no need to be baptized again if the church wishes it. It will not affect forgiveness one way or the other.

As a touching instance of Armenian tude, we give below an extract from a received from Miss Azneer Tahmaz, of Keny, Constantinople:

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD:—During astronomical and lamentable events which occur summer in the very capital of Turkey, many thousands of Armenians lost their lives. How many innocent ones perished then, how many peaceful families were killed! In the full days of great was the consolation brought Armenians by the relief and help which the people of the United States organized a them, proving thus their truly Christian humane feelings towards their suffering creatures. As for me—I am one of those indebted to the Americans for their own I am in duty bound to remember the name Louisa Niven, who, like all the missionary her utmost, and took care of everything necessities and consoling us in our sorrow. I shall never, never forget with what angelicness she gave us hope again to live after amities. I write these lines to express the ing gratitude and thankfulness we feel and also your prayers and blessing for my parents and for me.

E. A., Valley City, N. Dak. 1. What is the name of the Angelus? 2. Was there not a time when bells were rung for prayer just at sundown? 3. Did not some artist paint a picture to it before this air known as "The Angelus" composed?

1. The "Angelus" is the name of a prayer the Roman Catholic Church, said three a day to the Virgin, a bell being sounded each time to summon the devotees. Francois Millet, the famous French painter, has a noted picture representing peasants in the field listening with bowed heads to the bells of the "Angelus" in the evening. 3. Write to some music publisher for the hymn.

G. W., Mayfield, Wash. 1. A picture in THE MAIL-BAG, impression in my mind that is such a person as the Virgin Jew. What evidence is there of his existence? 2. Where, how, and when did St. John die?

1. The story is purely legendary but is frequently referred to by ancient and modern writers. The first Christian writer who mentioned it was Matthew 1:23. There is no record of it in the Scriptures. Tradition obtained in the Christian Church that John the Baptist should not die (see John 1:9) and the tradition of the Virgin Jew was the counterpart of other. 2. John, the only one of the twelve who escaped death, is said to have died a death sometime between 100 and 120.

THE SALOON'S WORST FOE.

The New Model Dining-Room Lately Opened as an Annex to the Bowery Mission—
Its Moral Influence on the East Side.

FRONT OF BOWERY MISSION ANNEX.

THE Bowery Mission which has stood for over eighteen years as a Gospel landmark in New York's most noted thoroughfare, has shown remarkable development in recent years. As an addition to the Mission Hall and an aid to the spiritual work, it opened a restaurant some two years ago, where wholesome, well-cooked food is supplied at absolute cost, a full meal being obtainable for a "nickel" and upwards. This experiment proved so great a boon to thousands of the very poor and the place was so largely patronized by that class, that it became necessary to open under annex and this was done several weeks ago, when the once notorious music-hall resort No. 55 Bowery was secured and transformed into a respectable and most home-like restaurant. From the first, the success of the "Bowery Mission Annex" has been assured, if one can form an opinion from the numbers of poor, hard-working men, young and old, who crowd its tables, glad of the opportunity to get a substantial meal for the mere price of the food itself, and certainly for less than half what such a meal would cost them elsewhere. Our photographs on this page furnish an idea of the general appearance of the new "Annex," interior and exterior, which its great size, large seating capacity and the general air of cleanliness, comfort and attractive-new and better lives. The homeless are housed, and the hungry fed, and even if they have no money, the really deserving are never turned away. This policy has been steadily pursued ever since the Bowery Mission passed under the control of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, two years ago. Hunger is often the mother of desperation and crime. Disappointed men, impoverished men, men of impaired will and self-restraint, being driven by outer conditions or inner fires, swarm by thousands into the Bowery lodging-houses. Here they find a bunk or place to sleep, but the places, the surroundings generally, are unfavorable to morality or comfort. In the Bowery Mission, with its clean dormitories, its well-equipped restaurants, its reading room, and its Gospel services, the physical, moral and spiritual needs of those who come there are abundantly met.

The new Annex is a marvel of artistic taste and cleanliness. The nickel that would be wasted in a glass of beer is here the price of a hearty, hot and wholesome meal, while the cost of a drink of vile whiskey will buy a "full-course dinner." The Annex dining room is situated on the main and only floor, and is over 100 feet deep. It extends to the roof, being surmounted by four large and beautiful domes, supported by ornamented arches, the ceiling of the domes being over fifty feet from the floor. Each dome supports seven pairs of sashes, giving perfect ventilation. The floor and tables are of marble. The walls on each side, front and rear, are decorated with harmonious tints and colors. Each panel sustains in clear lettering a passage of Scripture. In a single day over 2,300 men have dined at

"For what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul."
"Whether ye eat or whether ye drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."
"Boast not thyself of to-morrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth."

The saloons along the Bowery have met their worst foe, in the Bowery Mission and its restaurants. Many a poor victim of the cup has been led, through these kindly influences to forsake the rumshop forever, where he had squandered his substance on shame.

To Climb Mt. St. Elias

The officers of the Boston Appalachian Mountain Club have received by cable an order to secure an outfit for Prince Luigi, of Italy, who will reach this country very shortly on his way to the summit of Mount Saint Elias, in Alaska. The project is one which Prof. Fay, one of the most active of the Appalachians, has had much interest, and for some months he has been furnishing to the Italians all the information possible in the matter, for which purpose not a few of the precious books from the club library have crossed the ocean, none being nearer than in the library at Boston. The party will include Prince Luigi the noted mountain photographer Vittorio Sella, a number of other Italian Alpinists, five professional guides, and a retinue of porters. It will be the most thoroughly equipped expedition to enter

REV. JOHN McNEILL.

The Famous Scottish Preacher Now Holding Daily Services in New York.

DURING the past three weeks large audiences have assembled in New York

daily to listen to the famous Scottish preacher in Chickering Hall and in Cooper Union at noon and in Broadway Tabernacle in the evening. The title of "the Scottish Spurgeon" which has been given to Rev. John McNeill is very appropriate. He has the simple, plain, racy style which made the English preacher's sermons popular the world over. Never straining after novelty, never making a display of learning Mr. McNeill strives to present the Gospel in words so clear and direct that the most ignorant can understand, and so emphatic and earnest that the most careless may be impressed. His sermons, as will be seen from the specimen discourse printed on another page of this journal, are familiar talks, showing how the teaching of the Bible applies to the life of the present day. He believes that the Bible is an up-to-date book and the principles it inculcates are needed by people in all ranks of life in our time. It is this mode of presenting Bible truths, making them live in modern environment, that is the great charm of Mr. McNeill's preaching, giving it freshness and force and vitality.

Mr. McNeill is now devoting himself exclusively to evangelistic work and has not only conducted revival services throughout Great Britain, but has done very successful work in Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, South Africa and India. He is a Scotchman by birth. His father was a worker in the quarries of Houston in Renfrewshire, where John was born in 1854. He gained the rudiments of education and secured employment afterward on the Caledonian Railroad, but his active Christian work in the Sunday School, the Young Men's Christian Association and in the homes of the poor soon showed his capacity for higher work in the Lord's vineyard. He was sent to the Edinburgh University and subsequently to the University of Glasgow, where he matriculated with honor. He became minister of an important Free Church in Edinburgh and after a period of successful labor there, went to London to become pastor of Regent Square Presbyterian Church. In both spheres his labors were wonderfully blessed; but the frequent applications which reached him from all quarters to conduct special services led eventually to his resigning his London pastorate to become a servant to the churches of the world. One of his most remarkable labors was at the World's Fair at Chicago, where, at the invitation of Mr. Moody, for six months he preached to immense congregations.

the Annex, while at the main Bowery Mission over 1,000 more partook of five and ten cent meals. The rates at both places are the same.

Ever since the Annex was publicly opened May 3d, the large force of employees have been kept busy day and night. From the front door to the rear of the kitchen, everything is bright, clean, and cheerful, appealing to the eye as well as to the appetite. The wall panel inscriptions are specially appropriate, Biblical texts, fashioned in Roman letters, in blue and red colors, reminding the visitor of the character of the place.

Among others are the following:

"Behold I come quickly and my reward is with me, to give every man as his work shall be."
"So thus every one of us shall give account of himself to God."

JOY IN THE LORD'S HOUSEHOLD.

WHAT joy my lips may not speak,
To look up through the sweet apple bloom,
The fluttering green leaf, and feel
God's love in the springtime perfume.
To list to the thrush that has built
Her nest in the fair, leafy bower,
To feel God's care for the birds,
As rich notes the glad warblers pour.
To look within the clear depths
Of the soft sky bending above,
As the archway, the curtain of blue,
For the house of the Father of Love.
If clouds arise and pass o'er,
They but veil the unchangeable light,
And when the golden day fades,
New worlds are revealed by the night.
To know if mine were the power
To unwrap still fold after fold,
Of God's work, I'd find more of love,
Still more of His wisdom behold.

ness that pervades it, can only be realized by personal visit. Thousands of the poor, and especially the multitude of men who, cast upon the resources in the great metropolis, find the battle of life an exceedingly hard one, the Bowery Mission and its associations are a continually increasing blessing. Though the spiritual services held nightly at the Mission Hall, hundreds are every day led to accept Christ and begin

A BAG WITH HOLES.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Hagai 1:6. He that earneth wages, earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes.

In Persia, under the reign of Darius Hystaspes, the people did not prosper. They made money, but did not keep it. They were like people who have a sack in which they put money, not knowing that the sack is torn or eaten of moths, or in some way made incapable of holding valuables. As fast as the coin was put in one end of the sack it dropped out of the other. It made no difference how much wages they got, for they lost them. "He that earneth wages, earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes."

What has become of the billions and billions of dollars in this country paid to the working classes? Some of these moneys have gone for house rent, or the purchase of homesteads, or wardrobe, or family expenses, or the necessities of life, or to provide comforts in old age. What has become of other billions? Wasted in foolish outlay. Wasted at the gaming table. Wasted in intoxicants. Put into a bag with a hundred holes.

Gather up the money that the working classes have spent for drink during the last thirty years, and I will build for every working man a house, and lay out for him a garden, and clothe his sons in broadcloth and his daughters in silks, and place at his front door a prancing span of sorrels or bays, and secure him a policy of life insurance, so that the present home may be well maintained after he is dead. The most persistent, most overpowering enemy of the working classes is intoxicating liquor. It is the anarchist of the centuries, and has boycotted, and is now boycotting, the body and mind and soul of American labor. It is to it a worse foe than monopoly and worse than associated capital.

It annually swindles industry out of a large percentage of its earnings. It holds out its blasting solicitations to the mechanic or operative on his way to work, and at the noon spell, and on his way home at eventide; on Saturday, when the wages are paid, it snatches a large part of the money that might come into the family, and sacrifices it among the saloon-keepers. Stand the saloons of this country side by side, and it is carefully estimated that they would reach from New York to Chicago. "Forward, march," says the drink power, "and take possession of the American nation!"

The drink business is pouring its vitriolic and damnable liquids down the throats of hundreds of thousands of laborers, and while the ordinary strikes are ruinous both to employers and employees, I proclaim a strike universal against strong drink, which, if kept up, will be the relief of the working classes and the salvation of the nation. I will undertake to say that there is not a healthy laborer in the United States who, within the next ten years, if he will refuse all intoxicating beverage and be saving, may not become a capitalist on a small scale. Our country in a year spends one billion five hundred million and fifty thousand dollars for drink. Of course the working classes do a great deal of this expenditure. Careful statistics show that the wage-earning classes of Great Britain expend on liquors one hundred million pounds, or five hundred million dollars a year. Sit down and calculate, O working man! how much you have expended in these directions. Add it all up. Add up what your neighbors have expended, and realize that instead of answering the beck of other people you might have been your own capitalist. When you deplete a working man's physical energy you deplete his capital. The stimulated workman gives out before the unstimulated workman. My father said:

"I became a temperance man in early life, because I noticed in the harvest-field that, though I was physically weaker than other workmen, I could hold out longer than they. They took stimulants, I took none." A brick-maker in England gives his experience in regard to this matter among men in his employ. He says, after investigation: "The beer-drinker who made the fewest bricks made six hundred and fifty-nine thousand; and the abstainer who made the fewest bricks seven hundred and forty-six thousand. The difference in behalf of the abstainer over the indulger, eighty-seven thousand."

When an army goes out to the battle the soldier who has water or coffee in his canteen marches easier and fights better than the soldier who has whiskey in his canteen. Drink helps a man to fight when he has only one contestant, and that at the street corner. But when he goes forth to maintain some great battle for God and his country, he wants no drink about him. When the Russians go to war a corporal passes along the line and smells the breath of every soldier. If there be in his breath a taint of intoxicating liquor, the man is sent back to the barracks. Why? He cannot endure fatigue. All our young men know this. When they are preparing for a regatta, or for a ball club, or for an athletic wrestling, they abstain. Our working people will be wiser after awhile, and the money they fling away on hurtful indulgences they will put into co-operative association, and so become capitalists. If the working man put down his wages and then take his expenses and spread them out so they will just equal, he is not wise. I know working men who are in a perfect fidget until they get rid of their last dollar.

The following circumstances came under our observation: A young man worked hard to earn his six or seven hundred dollars yearly. Marriage day came. The bride had inherited five hundred dollars from her grandfather. She spent every dollar of it on the wedding dress. Then they rented two rooms in a third story. Then the young man took extra evening employment; almost exhausted with the day's work, yet took evening employment. It almost extinguished his eyesight. Why did he add evening employment to the day employment? To get money. Why did he want to get money? To lay up something for a rainy day? No. To get his life insured, so that in case of his death his wife would not be a beggar? No. He put the extra evening work to the day work that he might get a hundred and fifty dollars to get his wife a sealskin coat. The sister of the bride heard of this achievement, and was not to be eclipsed. She was very poor, and she sat up working nearly all the night for a great while until she bought a sealskin coat. I have not heard of the result on that street. The street was full of those who are on small incomes, but I suppose the contagion spread, and that everybody had a sealskin coat, and that the people came out and cried, practically, not literally: "Though the heavens fall, we must have a sealskin coat!"

I was out West, and a minister of the Gospel told me, in Iowa, that his church and the neighborhood had been impoverished by the fact that they put mortgages on their farms in order to send their families to the Philadelphia Centennial. It was not respectable not to go to the Centennial. Between such evils and pauperism there is a very short step. The vast majority of children in your almshouses are there because their parents are drunken, lazy, or recklessly improvident.

I have no sympathy for skinflint saving, but I plead for Christian prudence. You say it is impossible now to lay up anything for a rainy day. I know it, but we are at the daybreak of national prosperity. Some people think it is mean to turn the gas low when they go out of the parlor. They feel embarrassed if the door bell rings before they have the hall lighted. They apologize for the plain meal, if you surprise them at the table. Well, it is mean if it is only to pile up a miserly hoard. But if it be to educate your children, if it be to give more help to your wife when she does not feel strong, if it be to keep your funeral day from being horrible beyond all endurance, because it is to be the disruption and annihilation of the domestic circle—if it be for that, then it is magnificent.

There are those who are kept in poverty because of their own fault. They might have been well off, but they smoked or chewed up their earnings, or they lived beyond their means, while others on the same wages and on the same salaries went on to competency. I know a man who is all the time complaining of his poverty and crying out against rich men, while he himself keeps two dogs, and chews and smokes, and is full to the chin with whiskey and beer. Wilkins Micawber said to David Copperfield, "Copperfield, my boy, one pound income, expenses twenty shillings and sixpence; result, misery. But, Copperfield, my boy, one pound income, expenses nineteen shillings and sixpence; result, happiness." But, O working man, take your morning dram, and your noon dram, and your evening dram, and spend everything you have over for tobacco and excursions, and you insure poverty for yourself and your children forever!

If by some generous fiat of the capitalists of this country or by a new law of the Government of the United States, twenty-five per cent., or fifty per cent., or one hundred per cent. were added to the wages of the working classes of America, it would be no advantage to hundreds of thousands of them unless they stopped strong drink. Aye, until they quit that evil habit, the more money, the more ruin, the more wages, the more holes in the bag.

My plea is to those working people who are in a discipleship to the whiskey-bottle, the beer-jug, and the wine-flask. And what I say to them will not be more appropriate to the working classes than to the business classes, and the literary classes, and the professional classes, and all classes, and not with the people of one age more than of all ages. Take one good square look at the suffering of the man whom strong drink has enthralled, and remember that toward that goal multitudes are running. The disciple of alcoholism suffers the loss of self-respect. Just as soon as a man wakes up and finds that he is the captive of strong drink, he feels demeaned. I do not care how recklessly he acts. He may say, "I don't care," he does care. He cannot look a pure man in the eye unless it is with positive force of resolution. Three-fourths of his nature is destroyed: his self-respect is gone; he says things he would not otherwise say; he does things he would not otherwise do. When a man is nine-tenths gone with strong drink the first thing he wants to do is to persuade you that he can stop any time he wants to. He cannot. The Philistines have bound him hand and foot, and shorn his locks, and put out his eyes, and are making him grind in the mill of a great horror. He cannot stop. I will prove it. He knows that his course is bringing ruin upon himself. He loves himself. If he could stop he would. He knows his course is bringing ruin upon his family. He loves them. He would stop if he could. He cannot. Perhaps he could three months or a year ago, not now. Just ask him to stop for a month. He cannot; he knows he cannot, so he does not try.

I had a friend who was for fifteen years going down under this evil habit. He had large means. He had given thousands of dollars to Bible societies and reformatory institutions of all sorts. He was very genial, very generous, and very lovable, and whenever he talked about this evil habit he would say, "I can stop any time." But he kept going on, going on, down, down, down. His family would say, "I wish you would stop." "Why," he would reply, "I can stop any time if I want to." After a while he had delirium tremens; he had it twice; and yet, after that he said, "I could stop at any time if I wanted to." He is dead now. What killed him? Drink! Drink! And yet among his last utterances was, "I can stop at any time. He did not stop it because" he could stop it. Oh, there is a point in inebriation beyond which if a man goes he cannot stop!

One of these victims said to a Christian man, "Sir, if I were told that I could get a drink until to-morrow night and I had all my fingers cut off, I would bring the hatchet and cut them off." I have a dear friend in Philadelphia whose nephew came to him one day, and he was exhorting about his evil habit, "Uncle, I can't give it up. If there were a cannon and it was loaded, and a glass of wine were set on the mouth of that cannon, and I knew that you would fire just as I came up and took the glass, I would start, for I must have it." It is a sad thing for a man to wake up this life and feel that he is a captive. Says, "I could have got rid of this but I can't now. I might have lived a honorable life and died a Christian, but there is no hope for me now; there is no escape for me. Dead, but not buried. I am a walking corpse. I am a creation of what I once was. I am an immortal beating against the wires of a cage in this direction: beating against a cage until there is blood on the wire; blood upon my soul, yet not able to get out. Destroyed without remedy!"

I go on and say that the disciple of strong drink suffers from the loss of health. The men may remember that some year ago Dr. Sewell went through this country electrified the people by his lectures, which he showed the effects of alcoholism on the human stomach. He showed seven or eight diagrams by which he showed the devastation of strong drink upon the physical system. There thousands of people who turned from that ulcerous sketch, swearing abstinence from everything that could intoxicate.

God only knows what the drunkard suffers. Pain files on every nerve, and tears every muscle, and gnaws every bone, burns with every flame, and stings with every poison, and pulls at him with every torture. What reptiles crawl over his sleeping limbs! What fiends stalk his midnight pillow! What groans his ear! What horrors shiver through his soul! Talk of the rack, talk of the question, talk of the funeral pyre, talk of the crushing Juggernaut—he feels all at once. Have you ever been in the ward of the hospital where the ebriates are dying, the stench of the wounds driving back the attendants, voices sounding through the night? The keeper comes up and says, "Hush, no noise! Stop making all this noise!" It is effectual only for a moment. As soon as the keeper is gone they begin again, "O, God! O, God! Help! Help! Drink! Give me drink! Help! Take me off me! Take them off me! O, God!" and then they shriek, and they rave, and they pluck out their hair by handfuls, and they drive their nails into the quick, and they groan, and they shriek, and they pounce, and they ask the keepers to take them—"Stab me! Smother me! Strangle me! Take the devils off me!" Oh, no fancy sketch! That thing is going on now all up and down the land, and you further that this is going to be the death of some of you will die. I see it, I see it coming.

Again, the inebriate suffers through the loss of home. I do not care how much he loves his wife and children, if this passion for strong drink has mastered him, he will do the most outrageous things, and, if he could not get drink in any other way, he would sell his family into eternal bondage. How many homes have been broken up in that way no one but knows. Oh, is there anything that will destroy a man for this life, and damn him for the life that is to come! Do not me that a man can be happy when he knows that he is breaking his wife's heart and clothing his children with rags. There are on the roads and streets of our land to-day little children barefooted, washed, and unkempt—want on the patch of their faded dress and on the wrinkle of their prematurely old countenances, who would have been in church to-day, and as well clad as you are for the fact that rum destroyed their parents and drove them into the grave. Rum, thou foe of God, thou despoiler of homes, thou recruiting officer of the devil's army, thou destroyer of the human race!

But subject takes a deeper tone, and at last the unfortunate of whom I suffer from the loss of the soul. I feel intimate that in the future if we are unforgiven here, our badness is and appetites unrestrained, will hang with us and make our torment so that, I suppose, when an inmate wakes up in that world, he will feel an infinite thirst consuming him. I know in this world, although he may be very poor, he could beg or he could steal five cents with which to get a drink which would slake his thirst for a little while; but in eternity where is the rum to come from? "Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it moveth itself aright, though it up, for at the last it biteth like a serpent, and it stingeth like an adder." We have declared some time ago that we have a point beyond which a man cannot stop. I want to tell you that, a man cannot stop in his own sin, the Lord God by his grace can stop at any time. I was in a New York where there were men who had been reclaimed from sin. I heard their testimony, and the first time in my life flashed truth I never understood. They were victims of strong drink, and to give it up, but always failed. I know since we gave our hearts to God he has taken care of us." I believe at the time will soon come when the power of God will show its power not to save man's soul, but his body, and to instruct, purify, elevate and redeem it. I believe that, although you feel that at the roots of your tongues are an omnipotent thirst, if you will give your heart to God he will help you by his grace to conquer. Try it. It is your last chance. I have looked off upon the desolation. Sitting next to you in our religious meetings there are a good many people in peril; and, judging from ordinary instances, there is not one chance in a thousand that they will get clear of it. There are men in every congregation from Sabbath school to Sabbath school must make a mark, that if they do not change their lives within ten years they will, as to their souls, lie down in the hands of graves, and as to their souls, lie down in a drunkard's bed. I know that is a fearful thing to say, but I cannot help it. Beware! You have not yet been captured. Beware! Whether it be a beverage be in golden chalices, or a pewter mug, in the end at the top, in the end, let there be led out to your doom. Beware! When the books of judgment are read, and ten millions of drunkards come to meet their doom, I want you to bear witness at I, in the fear of God, and in the love of my soul, told you, that all affection and all kindness, to save of that which is ready exerted its force upon your soul, blowing out the light of its life—a premonition of the access of darkness for ever. If you could only hear intemperance with a drunkard's bones drumming on the head of the liquor cask the Dead March of funeral songs, methinks the very glance of a wine-cup would make you shudder, and the color of the liquor would make you think of the blood of the soul, and the rim on the top of the cup would remind you of the froth on the maniac's lip; and you would kneel down and pray God that rather than your children should become captives of this evil habit, you would like carry them out some bright spring day to the cemetery, and put them away to their last sleep, until at the call of the soul wind the flowers would could up all over the grave—sweet prophecies of the resurrection! God has a balm for such wound; but what flower of comfort ever wound on a drunkard's sepulchre?

girls. This lady passed away on the first day of the New Year after a most successful work.

MR. MADISON, POUGHKEEPSIE.

Home No. 4 was opened at 213 North 13th street, St. Louis, in January, 1893, and has done excellent service during these years. It is in charge of Mrs. Otis. Home No. 5 followed on April 27th, 1893, in Detroit, Mich. Very faithfully have the workers labored in that place, and they had the satisfaction of seeing many turn aside from sin to better lives. Home No 6 was started in Chicago, December 14th, 1893. Much was accomplished for the Lord in this place until, in the spring of 1894, the smallpox broke out and the Health Board closed the Home. The Union are now hoping for a larger house, as the need of the Home is very great in that city. Home No. 7, in New London, Conn., in connection with a Mission, was started by Mrs. Whittemore a few days after the founding of the first "Door of Hope." Though a most quiet little Shelter, much work was done in the hearts of those who entered. It has since been removed to Norwich, Conn. Home No. 8 was started in Worcester, June 6th, 1894, and is a very attractive home-like cottage. It is in charge of Miss Gaines, whose faith in God has sustained it throughout. Numbers have gone forth from this Home saved, and its work is still being blessed. Home No. 9, Nashville, Tenn., 513 Front street, was or-come. The reading-room is in charge of Miss M. J. Rochelle, 809 Wood street, through whose godly interest many are influenced to a better life and are led to go to the Door of Hope. This work is under the direct supervision of the Philadelphia Rescue Band. Home No. 11, 139 Queen street, Germantown, Pa., was opened July 8th, 1894, and is reaching many in the outskirts of Philadelphia. It is in a flourishing condition and doing valuable service. Home No. 12, in Rochester, N. Y., 293 Troop street, was opened Jan. 6th, 1895, and God has greatly blessed the efforts of the earnest Christian ladies in charge there in the conversion of many of the inmates. Home No. 13, Harrisburg, Pa., 17 North Front street, has been a real place of shelter to many and is doing effective work for God. Home No. 14, 84 Alabama street, Indianapolis, Ind., was opened April 1st, 1895. Miss Cecelia Smock is superintendent and the work has shown marked instances of a deep understanding of God's love. This is also a faith work, and during the past year over twelve hundred have been helped toward the better life. Home No. 15, at Warren, Pa., was opened March 1st, 1895. It is a real Home for the Friendless, and is being richly blessed in its efforts. Home No. 16, is at 2760 Cherry st., Kansas City, and was opened Sept. 25th, 1896. Home No. 17, is at Dallas, Tex. Through letters from Mrs. Collins (it was stated), this Home was opened, and though it has undergone many changes, God has blessed the labors of all in that place. The eighteenth Home is at 11 Warren street, New Haven, Conn., and was opened be utilized for the Door of Hope, the remainder serving as a mission and temporary shelter. Home No. 24, Auckland, New Zealand, was opened July 4, 1896. During the past few months the reports of this new Home have been of the most encouraging character, and great things are expected in connection with it. Home No. 25, is in Glasgow, Scotland. This Socety was organized during a visit of Mrs. E. M. Whittemore to Glasgow, where she held a number of services with this end in view. The workers are used of God in reaching many in blessing. The twenty-sixth of this series of wonderful Homes is at El Paso, Texas. It has not yet been publicly opened, although the mission is established and much is being done to befriend those who have few to care for them. Home No. 27, is at 46 Boulevard Bannan, Neuilly, near Paris, France. It is in charge of Miss Eymann, and is doing much for the poor French girls. Home No. 28, is the Macon, Florida, Door of Hope, and was opened April, '97. Home No. 29, is in San Diego, Cal., and is the latest of its class in the Golden State. Those connected with it are looking upward for guidance and blessing. Home No. 30, is at 122 Harrison Street, Boston, Mass., and Miss A. Gertrude Wood is superintendent. Miss Wood has had experience in opening other Homes, and is trusting implicitly the Lord to supply all needs in this one, and firmly believes it will be the means of bringing many souls to the Cross. No. 31, Galveston, Texas, will be known as the Bethesda Door of Hope under the auspices of Mrs. Carter and Mrs. Nichols and will shortly be dedicated. This is, indeed, a surprising record of magnificent results flowing from the consecrated work of one godly woman.

The Door of Hope Union has a Foreign Missionary branch known as the "Delia Foreign Missionary Society," and through the sale of Mrs. Whittemore's books and tracts, and also through the work of the inmates of Homes Nos. 1 and 2, over $8,000 have been realized and devoted to sending the Gospel abroad, as a thank-offering for God's goodness in caring for the home work of the Union.

A Burmese Convert's Bible.

The Burman Missionary tells the story of an old man who, years ago, when a heathen, came in possession of a copy of the Psalms in Burmese. He began to read, and, before he had finished the book, he had resolved to cast his idols away. Then he fell in with a white missionary, who gave him a New Testament. With joy he read for the first time the story of salvation. "Twenty years I have walked by starlight," he said; "now I see the sun."

ganized June 19th, 1894. The building was formerly a resort of sin, but has now been dedicated to God. The owner was converted and is now spending her time bringing souls to Christ. It is desirable that this work should be enlarged. Many have been saved under the deep spiritual teaching of the workers. Home No. 10.—1931 Dauphin St., Philadelphia is in charge of Miss Gray and was opened July 3d, 1894. It is wholly a faith work and has been a source of great encouragement to others, not only in the salvation of many, but in the constant visitations of the Rescue Band, who have the Home in charge, to several hundred notorious houses and the scattering of the Word in their midst. Here was opened the first "Door of Hope" Reading-room in the heart of a great city where the friendless and unfortunate girls (especially the educated portion among them) delight to June 7th, 1896. Although young, it is doing a grand work. Home No. 19, 17 Lawson street, Lowell, Mass., has been lately enlarged, and the workers are looking forward for even greater results than in the past. Home No. 20, is at Wilmington, Del., and was opened in Jan. 1896. It is a Home rich in promise of precious results. Home No. 21, at Toledo, O., was opened January 30, 1896. God has greatly blessed the workers and inmates, and they are now arranging for a larger house. Home No. 22, at Erie, Pa., was established February 1, 1896. It has produced good results and may be soon united with another charity in an adjoining city. Home No. 23, is at Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Before the Home was formally opened, the Society was organized in February, 1897, all cases requiring attention being received in New York and Tappan. Now a beautiful building is completed, a portion of which is to

SINS OF THE TONGUE.

Sunday School Lesson for June 6. James 3: 1-13 Golden Text: Ps. 34: 13.
BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

KEEP thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile" (Ps. 34: 13.) A command, the wisdom of which almost all acknowledge, but few obey. God himself, through his inspired servant

James, speaks of the difficulty, even the impossibility of obeying it by the unaided strength of man: "the tongue can no man tame." But a tamed tongue, which is become a member yielded to God as an instrument of righteousness (Rom. 6: 13), becomes the voice of the Holy Spirit to others. It is a duty, and therefore a possibility to keep the tongue, but who shall be its keeper? Impotent man, or he of whom David wrote, "The Lord is thy Keeper." "The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil." (Ps. 121: 5, 7.)

David, who wrote the words, "Keep thy tongue from evil," set himself to obey the precept of which God had made him the channel: "I said, I will take heed to my way, that I sin not with my tongue. I will keep my mouth with a bridle while the wicked is before me." (Ps. 39: 1.) But David's bridle did not answer; while he was dumb from evil words, he found that self-restraint made him dumb "even from good," and at last the pressure from within was too great. "Then spake I with my tongue" (ver. 3). David was learning that to keep the tongue the heart also must be kept, for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" (Matt. 12: 34), and any constraint put upon the tongue while the heart is in a ferment, can only be a temporary constraint, it will soon break loose again. And while it is true that "whoso keepeth his mouth and his tongue keepeth his soul from troubles," (Prov. 21: 23), yet David found out in the end that only God had power to keep the tongue, and he learned to pray, "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips," and we see the prayer was answered.

But what are the special sins of the tongue?

THE SIN OF LYING

is first and foremost. And this includes not only deliberate lying, including business lying and polite lying, which should not be possible in a true child of God, but also what is far too common among us, the giving a wrong impression. For instance, a young man may hastily and without consideration give up a good position. He lays himself open to be suspected of wrong-doing; you want to shield him, and as he was ill just before, you mention his illness in connection with his hasty action without saying it was the cause of it, but secretly hoping that in the minds of others it will take that shape. This is untruth, the principle of lying is at the bottom of it. God cares for that child of his, whom you are trying to shield, far more than you care for him; and anything which is not transparent in you can only minister death to him: light and life go together.

A great deal of the untruth which comes out in the words of Christians arises from distrust of God and consequent fear of man. The enemy tempts a child of God to take things into his own hands, and he finds himself in a tangle, in danger of being misunderstood and of misleading others. The enemy attempts to stir up his imagination to conceive what will happen if so and so gets to know a certain thing, and he tempts him to appear as though he knew nothing about it, or to speak so as to parry the questions which are asked him. If he yields he is untrue. Evasion is untruth. "Transparent truth is the only indication that we are in the sense relative with our God as he was in whose mouth was found no guile" (1. Peter 2: 22). He said, "Whatsoever I speak, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak." His was a tamed tongue, a kept tongue because his heart was always listening to his Father. Is it too much for us to expect that if as the Father sent him, so he sends us, that he will graciously keep our life as the Father kept his, and guide our words as the Father guided his? And yet how few of us have any experience of a tongue thus divinely bridled.

Another sin of the tongue is FLATTERING.

David's enemies flattered with their tongue (Ps. 5: 8), and while he murmured that the faithful fail, he says that the children of men "speak vanity everyone with his neighbor; with flattering lips and with a double heart do they speak;" and his prayer was, "Deliver me from lying lips and from a deceitful tongue." What is flattery? It is a great sin, and consists in praising the creature for powers which he owes to the Creator. Every word of flattery to man is a robbery and dishonor to God. Flatterers have always a selfish end in view, they seek to gain favor with those whom they flatter by pleasing them in making them pleased with themselves. Anyone whose words fill us with self-consciousness and admiration of ourselves. And let us take care how in giving encouragement to those who need it, we lead their thought always to the Source of all success, that they may give the praise to Him to whom praise is due. Flattery wrongs God and man.

Another of the sins of the tongue, and a very common one, is

UNKIND WORDS:

There are many, even among those who claim to be God's children, who habitually criticize and disparage others. If it comes back to the person spoken of, and it often does, this sin is calculated to produce in him distrust of and bitterness against the brother who has spoken thus of him. The root of harsh words is pride and self-esteem. The speaker wants to commend himself at the expense of his brother, and to lower that brother in the esteem of those to whom he speaks: it is "a backbiting tongue." The apostle James says, "The tongue is a little member and boasteth great things. Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth: and the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity: so is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body and setteth on fire the course [or wheel] of nature, and is set on fire of hell." Very specially in unkind words the little member kindles a great fire. How many churches and missions have been utterly broken up by one or two backbiting or insinuating tongues! How many sleepless nights and days of bitterness have resulted from one unkind, malicious tongue!

"It [the unbridled tongue] is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison." And he puts the matter in the strongest light when he says, "Therewith bless we God even the Father, and therewith curse we even which are made after the multitude of God. Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren these things ought not so to be." A family kneels together for morning worship, and in the hymn or prayer all join together in blessing God. A few moments later, the hardest, most bitter words are spoken by one or more. The same tongue utters the blessing and the cursing. But behind that tongue is the fountain of the heart. If the blessing came from that fountain, cursing could not go out from it. Which was the real product of the heart, and which was the idle word? Was it a real heart to man and an unreal heart to God? Was the heart a blessing or a cursing heart? The fountain cannot send forth both sweet and bitter, both salt water and fresh. Did not the bitter word to man betray the unreality of the praise to God?

How then shall we keep our tongue? James says that "if any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body." This is saying a great deal: it means being ready for the Lord. "Behold," he says, "we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us, and we turn about their whole body;" but who can put a bit into his tongue and turn about his whole body? No man; only God can do this. "Behold also the ships, which though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm whithersoever the governor listeth."

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE people to whom James wrote were a different kind of people from those to whom Paul addressed most of his epistles. It was not necessary for James to denounce the grosser crimes, as his readers had been brought up in the Jewish faith, and were not, like Paul's readers, accustomed to regard crime as a venial thing. His epistle, therefore, has a special adaptation for us, because it deals with sins and faults which are prevalent in a society trained in the way of morality. Prominent among these are the sins of word and all through his epistle, James recurs to this subject, as if it was one that had been pressed on his attention by his observation of the people around him. He perceives how much mischief is done by mere talk and urges his readers to be particularly watchful about the things they say. The tongue is capable, as he points out, of doing infinite harm. Not only is it the instrument of blasphemy and profanity, not only is it responsible for lying and slandering, but it is capable of robbery, as it may steal a man's good name. Indirectly it may cause murder by inciting men's passions, and it is used in sensual sins to provoke evil thoughts. It is a small part of the human anatomy, but it may involve all the rest in wickedness and in punishment. A little consideration shows how true his contention is. Every one has witnessed quarrels proceeding from some gossiping tongue and bitter suffering resulting from some harsh and unkind speech. Ecclesiasticus says: "The stroke of a whip maketh a mark in the flesh; but the stroke of the tongue will break bones." And it is just as true about written words. As we have good reason to know, a book may so inflame a nation's anger that the peaceful solution of a dispute may become impossible and leave no way open to a settlement, but a war that makes thousands of women widows and millions of children fatherless. Words are not "trifles light as air," but sparks that may set a whole city on fire. Every one has had occasion to some time the power of a word. A may be so discouraged by harsh reproach an unjust accusation, that his whole life may be affected by it. A few words of ridicule may turn away the effect of a sermon, or deter a youth from entering the kingdom of God. The bitter speech of a husband, or the biting sarcasm of a wife, has many a time led to the breaking up of a family. Many a church has failed in work and power merely because so its members were captious and censorious. On the other hand, how much good can do! The mother's gentle talk to her child, the father's manly appeal to the orator's denunciation of public wrongdoing, the poet's "palace of beauty" these are mere words; but how great their influence! James does not exalt when he compares the tongue to a helm that turns the whole ship, therefore, good advice that he gives he urges his readers to tame or control. Not an easy matter, by any means, man who succeeds in doing it. James regards as perfect, and able to bring being into subjection. "The tongue no man tame." It is necessary to the help of God. The fountain of evil heart, which the tongue disseminates be cleansed. A watch must be set heedless speaking, in which no harm tended, may injure some susceptible hearer. Kindness, forbearance, patience, gentleness, must show themselves in conversation and realizing how much harm may be done by the tongue, we weigh our words and not scatter brands among inflammable things.

The tongue is a fire. A traveller once saw a significant sign painted continuously beside the track on an English railroad. It read, "Shut your ash pan, asked a friend in the car with much the meaning of it was. He said: 'It for the engineer. We are coming on long, wooden bridge, and the Company didn't want any hot coals from the motive dropped on it. They might easily set the bridge on fire!' This over this caution, it occurred to me many calamities the world would spare if there were no hot provisions dropped around. I have seen a whole neighborhood set by the care of a few words from an indiscreet talker. Words are among very combustible stuff in the shape of men's angry passions. It is well if we heeded the warning, 'Shut your ash pan.'"

In many things we offend all. The Revised Version gives a better rendering: "In many things we all stumble." More people stumble in word than in their ways. An aged minister was called on a young man who was going to the penitentiary for robbing his employer. Looking intently at the prisoner the old man said, "I believe I have met you before." The prisoner replied: "Yes, I remember you well, but it is ten years since we met. You are partly responsible for my being here." The minister stared at him as he said, "I," he said, "why, I never did you any harm in my life." "Not intentionally," the prisoner answered, "but a deadly wrong I committed. When I was a lad of twelve an old I went with my father to hear a preacher and you joined us as we walked back. I had been a good deal impressed by the sermon and had almost determined to go to the preacher and get him to show me the way to Christ. But I heard you talking to father and ridiculing the preacher as an ignorant man who was unfit to preach to intelligent people. It reached my heart, but I concluded what you said that he was not a fit man to go to him and I never inclined to seek religion afterward. I went to business, I went without protection of religion and here I am."

Behold how great a matter a little kindleth. When the entomologist looks at the germs of the gipsy moth which have been sent to him from Africa for examination it seemed a very small matter. But moths came to life and they multiplied and consumed crops to such an extent that it was necessary to exterminate them. That was no easy matter. The Legislature of Massachusetts has already spent a quarter of a million dollars in trying to rid of the pest. It is sometimes difficult to undo the mischief that is done by a false report heedlessly circulated.

MORE AID FOR STARVING INDIA.

Another Remittance of Thirty Thousand Dollars Sent by Cable to American Missionaries in the Famine Districts to Feed the Hungry Millions.

A FURTHER sum of $30,000 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund has this week been cabled to missionaries in India for the relief of the famine sufferers. This has been done in consultation with the New York secretaries of the American Board and the Methodist Baptist, Presbyterian and Women's Union Missionary Societies who are invited to inform us of any cases of need having arisen at the stations of their respective missionaries. The secretaries gladly availed themselves of the opportunity and a list of representative missionaries was prepared to whom remittances of five hundred or a thousand dollars, according to their need, have been sent by cable. Missionaries who are seeing starving people, or have taken over the care of them, will now be enabled to go on with their Christlike work, saved from the painful necessity of leaving the people that their resources are exhausted. We can imagine how thankful they are to find their hands strengthened in their good work, and to perceive the Christian people at home who sent out to preach the Gospel, are standing by them in the crisis and enabling them to succor the starving people in the famine trial.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would have been glad to send them corn instead of money had it been possible, because we have purchased with the $30,000 four times as much corn as the missionaries can buy with it in India; but we had not been able to get ships, it would have been certainly four weeks and possibly six weeks before the corn could have reached the stations where the starving people sit patiently waiting for the relief.

How many of them might have died in that time, was a appalling thought and we therefore took the promptest and surest way of dealing with the emergency. The amount remitted, added to the $30,000 previously cabled, makes a total of $60,000 which has been forwarded. The cost of freight on the balance of corn over and above the gifts of the western farmers, which was necessary to complete the cargo of the City of Everett now sailing from San Francisco, was in figures $20,000. We are now arranging to fill the other half of which the Washington Government promises to place at our disposal at New York. Negotiations for this vessel have been in progress during the last two weeks, the Navy Department making a sincere effort to co-operate with the fund, but experiencing considerable difficulty in carrying out the wishes of Congress. Steamer after steamer has been considered and without just at the moment the matter seemed to be hopelessly settled. We have been in almost daily communication with the Navy Department on the subject by mail, telegraph, and personal visit, and Secretary Long and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt are hopeful of the second vessel will now soon be coming. This delay (occasioned as the naval officials assure us by the great difficulty in finding a suitable American vessel, disengaged and ready for charter, the solution of Congress expressly stipulating that she must be American) has been a serious disappointment, as it has delayed the sailing to a much later date than was expected. When the vessel is finally chosen it will be filled with corn to its most capacity, and we expect that the value of the cargo will cost not less than $150,000. This will make a grand total in cash and food of $125,000, which the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have sent to their brethren in starving India. Over and above this amount, there is a balance of $2,000 in the fund, which with other contributions as may be received and with the proceeds of the sale of corn arriving after the sailing of the vessels, and of corn which the dock inspectors pronounced unfit for a long voyage will constitute a fund which Dr. Klopsch will take with him to India. It will be used in promoting such industrial work as may have been begun with the object of preventing future famine, such as the construction of wells or of irrigation, or in supplying the people with seed or farm implements to enable them to resume the cultivation of their land, millions of acres of which will be untilled without such assistance, as the people have eaten their seed-corn and sold their implements for food. Besides these objects, on which in the permanent interests of the people, money may wisely be spent, some provision will have to be made for the support of the tens of thousands of bright little orphans who must have food, clothing, and Christian education to rear them for Christ, and fit the most intelligent of them to become missionaries to their own people when they grow up. A large sum may be needed for this purpose, and we hope that before Dr. Klopsch reaches India the little balance of $2,000, which is all we feel justified in withholding from immediate distribution, will have grown into a substantial sum commensurate with the great need.

Rev. N. G. Hobbs, our Commissioner, who is now preparing to sail with the relief steamer The City of Everett, from San Francisco, in charge of the first of the relief cargoes, has written us this letter, previous to his departure:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., May 13, 1897.
Dear Dr. Klopsch:—Now that I have come thus far on my journey as your commissioner to carry a ship-load of corn to the starving people of India, I wish to say that I am glad I am on the way. I and my wife appreciate all the dangers and inconveniences of so long a journey in mid-summer. But I know the condition of the people in India, their extreme number of persons on the Government Relief works—which is the accepted gauge of the pressure of the famine—has risen to 3,120,000. Large numbers who shrank from applying for public relief, having heretofore supported themselves by honest labor, have now, their savings entirely exhausted, accepted the only alternative to starvation, and with their wives and children are breaking stones or mending roads for the Government in return for a small daily dole of food. Delicate ladies and intelligent children are now to be seen in any Government relief camp painfully doing this unpalatable labor. Miss Helen Richardson, the Principal of the Industrial Home for women in Bombay recently paid a personal visit to the villages in the famine districts and inspected the Relief Camps. She returned to Bombay on April 10, and the following day gave the people of the city a report of the painful scenes she had witnessed. The Bombay Guardian says:

"Miss Richardson declared that the inhabitants of large city centres like Bombay had no realization of the dreadful ravages of the famine. The situation in India was indeed serious. Humanity in the most affected parts was made up of so many living skeletons. Pressed by hunger, these beings knew no fear, and the naturally intense love that the mother once had for her children was now dead or forgotten in the absorbing quest of food. A once fond mother offered her child for three rupees to a missionary, saying that she wanted to buy enough food to satisfy herself for a few days, and then die. The missionary refused to purchase the child but would accept cus-

121 little children fed there daily, all under twelve years old. They are truly little waifs reduced to very skeletons covered with skin. The little ones who had come here a few weeks before were almost fat and chubby, and thus, this poor-house has been the means of saving many lives."

How thankful our readers must be that throughout the length and breadth of India such stations have been established, where, by their bounty the food has been provided with which the poor, starving little creatures are being fed. Let all who have given them food pray for these children that God will make them his own.

Miss Bannister of Poonah, to whom one of our remittances of $500 was sent in March, writes: "The villages are nearly deserted, and the poor people are wandering about in the most terrible condition. They have sold their last possessions, and wander about with the merest rag on. The poor children often deserted by their parents, or more frequently orphans, wander helplessly and hopelessly about reduced gradually to the most fearful state of starvation. You find them groveling in the dust of the road, eating little raw grains of anything that may have dropped from the carts; others turn over dust heaps in the town, and eat remnants of food which they find there. These are not even the low caste people, but many of them are of the highest castes, who have been gradually reduced by two or three years of famine."

"We were able to collect and bring away forty-four of the poorest and most starving children, and we are going to fetch another sixty. We are trying to get up subscriptions to keep these poor children; $15 will keep one of them for the whole year. Of course these are all heathen children, and here we have the most wonderful opportunity of getting them into our Christian schools. It might take us ten years of hard work to get in half the number under ordinary circumstances. We don't believe that Christian people will let us be crippled for want of money."

Several subscribers have written THE CHRISTIAN HERALD asking about the truth of a statement made by a visitor from Bombay, and published in a New York daily journal, to the effect that there had been no deaths from starvation in India. There is no truth in the statement, and either the person said to have made it was incorrectly reported, or he did not know the facts. That there have been a multitude of deaths from starvation during the past six months is sufficiently attested by the letters and cable messages of Chief Justice Sir Francis McLean, Chairman of the Famine Relief Committee; by the newspapers of India; by reports of missionaries, and by the letters of our own commissioner in India, Mr. Benjamin Aitken, who went through the famine districts and described in this journal the awful scenes he witnessed. A similar statement was made during the famine of 1877, but at the end of the famine it was officially admitted that five and a half millions had perished of hunger.

need and the great good the grain which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is sending will do, and am glad to go on this mission. I believe a kind Providence will care for us and bring us safely back home again. If we should not return safely, but should be overtaken by death or disaster of any kind, the calamity would come to us while in the path of duty. I feel the way has opened providentially in this whole matter and have not a doubt I am where God wants me to be; should disaster come to us no blame could possibly attach to you. I want to thank you for all your personal kindness in having done everything in your power to provide for our comfort. I count it a privilege to thus serve you and the cause of suffering humanity which I believe lies very near your heart.

R. G. HOBBS.

We bespeak for Mr. Hobbs the prayers of our readers for the successful accomplishment of his mission and his safe return.

The suffering of the people shows no sign of abatement. Indeed the latest reports indicate an increase of distress. The

A Jubulpore paper publishes a letter from another lady who makes similar report. She says: "I have spent much time in going amongst these poor people. I have been with my husband to the two largest villages in the districts of Sehora and Murwara. Hundreds of poor people lie along the street hardly able to speak beyond muttering 'buhkha!' 'buhkha!' which means, 'hungry!' 'hungry!' but one has only to see them to realize this. The legs and arms of the men and women are no thicker than those of any ordinary child of three, and the little children's limbs can only be compared to sticks—and thin ones, too." Last week we visited the children's poor-house in the village of Murwara, which was started by a missionary clergyman some six months ago. It would indeed be hard to find a living picture more harrowing. There are at an average Reform by Joining Societies.

THE method of modern reforms is to organize anti-societies; to expel by force, and not as Dr. Chalmers expressed it, by the power of a new affection. I once knew a man converted who had been for the period of a generation, a habitual user of intoxicating liquors. He never signed the temperance pledge. But he became from that day a total abstainer. He had been living with a woman as his wife, to whom he was not married. He sent for his pastor, and was lawfully married. And so he went on, rectifying many things that were wrong; ceasing to do evil and learning to do well. The best antidote to wrong-doing is right-doing. The best cure of wrong loves and desires, is right ones.

Societies of reform do not always strike at the root of evils; but, they cut off some of the branches. It would be better for immoral men to abandon all kinds of wrong-doing; to ask with the Apostle: "Not my feet only, but my hands and my head." But so far as they go, societies of reform are good. They make little reformatory circles outside of the Church; of which institution some men fight shy. And sometimes these reformatory circles result in the actual conversion of their members.

There is danger, however, that others may substitute them for that name which is above every name. You may get temporary reform without the radical principle which makes reform permanent. The radical principle is what we all need. We want Christ's method, which is to first make the tree good, and that will make the fruit good.

Christ's Confidence in the Truth.

THE Great Sower is like the earthly husbandman. He scatters the seed and lets the sunshine and rain and the earth do the rest. How without observation Christianity began! How true, how literally true to the figure of the dying of the seed in the ground in the spring-time, was the death of Christ! "Except it die, it abideth alone." When Christ was lifted on the Cross, he saw the travail of his soul and was satisfied. He saw the abundance of the earth and the seas swelling his victorious hosts. He drew no literal sword. He commanded Peter to put the sword in its sheath. It has always remained there. He did not come as Mohammed did, to take it out but to save it. It was by the word of his mouth, by the word he spake, that he won his triumphs. And this is the method of his followers. That sword never will be sheathed.

The method of the husbandman is first to prepare the soil. Much of the husbandman's skill lies in this. What growth does he want to gather from a field in question? What qualities are required in the soil? This is his problem; just as simple as any in arithmetic. Give him time, and he will make the soil obedient to any demand he shall make of it. It will respond, it may be in wheat or barley or corn or potatoes. But, respond it will. He antagonizes no power of nature, or of the God of nature. He only works out a problem.

This is the method of the Prince of Peace. He brings no implements of war. He tears down no political or domestic institutions. He prepares the way for a harvest; and it surely comes. In due time come the great wagons and the harvest home.

The Great Teacher has his own original methods. There were great political abuses in his day. The Jews were under tyrannous Roman Emperors. There were two of the maddest, bloodiest of the Cæsars, which his early kingdom had to encounter. What was the result? In a few centuries the head of the Church had become the head of the Roman Empire; the stone cut out of the mountain had filled the whole earth. He had drawn no literal sword. The literal sword had been kept in the sheath where Peter put it. The sword literal had been invoked against him and his followers. The Colosseum had been filled with triumphing martyrs. The wild beasts of the forests had fed on their flesh and licked up their blood. But even there was it written: "By this sign we conquer!"

Moral Contagion.

EVER and anon there is an epidemic of crime. What flourish of dirk and crack of pistol! Five or six murders reported. Sheriffs, judges, jurors, attorneys busy in the arrest and punishment of crime. Drunkenness, burglary, assassination. Let the scientists and statisticians tell us the cause that we may propose a remedy. Diagnosis must precede prescription. May there not be something in the atmosphere at certain times, elements dominant which create turpitude?

The east wind we all know makes some people sullen and saturnine, and hatches out Jeremiahs, while the northwest wind is the mother of jocundity and high spirits. Perhaps there are other points of the compass responsible for thievery and human slaughter. The moral effect of climatic disturbance would make a subject of itself. Job, like some, deplored the east wind, and Solomon prayed earnestly for the coming of the north wind; but I do not think the atmosphere can account for everything. I think that at certain times the diabolic spirits make especial raid on an individual, or a community, or a state. Sometimes it is the demon of fraud, then the demon of bloodthirstiness, then the demon of burglaries, then the demon of unchastity, then the demon of slander, or all together, that assail a city, and the most enterprising newspaper has not enough reporters to sketch the crimes, and the police stations are crowded with offenders. Our cities are at times under the influence of such a diabolic incursion. To resist it, let our municipal executives take especial vigilance, and our Young Men's Christian Associations put forth an especial endeavor, and our churches make themselves more attractive. Wake up, men and women of God, to more prayer and vehemence of well-doing. What we do in behalf of our beloved cities must be done in a short time, or we will never do it at all. God gives us opportunity to make just so many strokes for the right, and if we miss one stroke, we miss it forever.

A Little Matter of Money.

IT is unpleasant not to have money," says Mr. Hazlett; indeed, it has become a sort of social offence to be short of virtue in this respect; for both nationally and personally, we are loth to confess so tragic a calamity. We may assert that having food and clothes, we are therewith content; and that we would not encounter the perils and snares of vast wealth; but we are quite sure that this humility and contentment is not a fine name for being too lazy to earn money, or too extravagant to keep it? Again, if all were content with the simple satisfaction of their necessities—if nobody wanted to be rich—nobody would be industrious or frugal, or strive to acquire knowledge. Who then would build our churches, and endow our colleges? Who would send out missionaries, and encourage science and inventions? The golden grapes may be out of our reach, but they are a noble fruit when pressed by kindly hands, and have given graciously unto the world their wine of consolation.

The fact is that we have come to a time in which the want of money is about as bad a moral distemper as the love of it. The latter position is an admitted truth; the former is only beginning to put forth its claims to the notice of professed moralists. Whatever special virtue there was in poverty seems to be in direct antagonism to the spirit of the present day, for there is no doubt that worldly prosperity has come to be regarded as one of the legitimate fruits of the Gospel. The modern Church puts forth her hands and grasps the promise of the life that now is, as well as that which is to come. Why not? Money gives a power of doing good that nothing material can equal. Even "The Truth" has now to depend on the currency, and the most evangelical societies pay treasurers as well as missionaries.

The amount of money in a man's pocket is a great moral factor. He who has plenty of ready cash and is not good-natured needs a thorough change, and nothing but being born again will cure him. But the man who is in a chronic state of poverty, is a man placed in selfish relations to every one around him. How hard it is for such a one to be generous, just, and sympathetic! He is almost compelled to look on his fellow-creatures with the eye of a slave-merchant to consider: How can they profit me? What can I gain by them? He must marry for money or not marry for the want of it. His friendship is a kind of traffic. His religion is subject to considerations, for he will either go to church for a certain connection, or he will not go at all because of the collections.

Now, there is abundance of living strength in Christianity to meet this and all other special wants of the age. There is no doubt that money is the principle of our social gravitation, and we need preachers who will not be afraid to tell us the truth, even though nobody has ever told it just in that particular way before. We accept without demur, all that has been said about the evils of loving money; will some of our spiritual teachers tell us how to avoid the evils, and cure the moral and physical distress caused by the want of money? That this is a gigantic evil, we have constant proof in the daily papers; in murder, theft, suicide, domestic misery and cruelty. These criminals are far seldomer influenced by the love of money than by the want of it. If instead of being without a dollar, they had had sufficient for their necessities, would they have run such risks, incurred such guilt, staked life on one desperate chance, flung it away in despairing misery?

Of course the word "sufficient" is very elastic. It can be so moderate and temperate; and again it can grasp at impossibilities. "My wants," said the Count Mirabel, "are few: a fine house, fine carriages, fine horses, a complete wardrobe, the best opera box, the first cook, and plenty of pocket-money—that is all I require." He thought his desires very temperate; so also did the Scotchman, who, praying for a modest competency, added, "and that there be no mistake, let it be seven hundred pounds a year, paid quarterly in advance." There are indeed all sorts of difficulties connected with this question, and anybody can find their way into them. But there must also be a way out; and if our guides would survey the ground a little, they would earn and have our thanks. For undoubtedly this want of money is as great a provocation to sin as the love of it. An empty purse is as full of wicked thoughts as an evil heart; and the Father who allotted seven guardian angels to man, and made five of them hover round his pockets—empty or full—knew well his most vulnerable points.

BRIEF NOTES.

The graduating class at Princeton Theological Seminary this year is one of the largest it has known, seventy receiving their degrees. There were also special exercises in connection of the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the completion of the Westminster Standard.

The Woman's Hospital in Canton, China, can be realized only by people who are free of prejudices of that conservative nation. The Chinese women have each given $200 toward the building of this hospital, and a third has given $100.

The fourteenth annual meeting of the International Missionary Union will be held at Springfield, N. Y., June 9-15. All men or women, or have been, foreign missionaries in any of evangelical denomination constitute membership of the union, and will be entertained without cost during the week.

Delegations of twenty-five or more San Francisco Christian Endeavor Convention advised by the Committee to secure hotel accommodations in advance. Every State has a delegation manager, through whom this done. The Convention will open on Wednesday, July 7, and will close on Monday night, July 13.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions has closed its financial year with very better results than was feared. The receipts for the month of April far exceeded those of the corresponding month of last year, and where deficit of about $150,000 was feared, it is now that it will not exceed $6,000.

The annual gain of Christians in the mission fields is now estimated by the Missionary Review of the World, at one hundred ten years ago, by the same mode of calculation annual increase was found to be sixty thousand. In 1825 there were only sixty thousand Christians in the mission churches of the world.

The Supreme Court of the United States has dismissed the complaint of Rev. Wm. I. who was imprisoned for preaching in the police authority on the common of Boston. The Court holds that inasmuch as Mr. Davis had a permit from the police by application, he had no ground for complaint.

The West Side Fruit and Flower Mission, New York, continues its ministrations among the sick in the hospitals and tenements of the city. Donations of money, literature, and delicacies are very acceptable and will be gladly received. They are sorely needed. They should be pre-paid to the mission, 312 West 14th street, New York.

The Congregational Summaries for 1896, reported by Hazen, are as follows: Whole churches, 3,482; added, 176; gain, 65; churches, 615,220; gain, 12,633; additions, 54,000; which 32,137 on confession; Sunday school members, 687,573; gain, 4,995; benevolent contributions, $1,129,456; decrease, $57,594; home missions, $5,871,128; increase, $163,515.

A St. Louis Pastor, writing to a contemporary of the results of Mr. Moody's visit to St. Louis, says: "The spiritual life of the churches has quickened, and a Sunday evening service has been organized in the Music Hall of the Exposition Building. Rev. S. J. Nichols, D. D., delivered the first sermon, and other city pastors will unite in maintaining the service."

Henry Varley has been holding evangelistic services in Salt Lake City, Utah, under the auspices of the Ministerial Evangelical Association. Meetings were crowded throughout, and the most interesting was manifested. At the beginning of the Congregational Church was used, but as things increased, the Salt Lake Tabernacle was occupied. Meetings were also held in the Y. M. C. A. parlors and in the Methodist Church.

A shrewd observer of political conditions writes respecting the results in New Zealand giving the franchise to women: "At election time women favor men of high character and irreproachable political record. Now men of good character are preferred to experienced politicians who are the men Commandments out of politics. The power in politics is summed up in the statement that women electors think more of men and less of questions than male voters do. They interfere from good men good laws will come."

The Women's Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church in America has issued a balance sheet for the year. The income of the Board was $35,415.81 and the expenses $31,415.81, leaving a balance of $888.09. At the annual meeting Dr. Henry J. Scudder made an earnest appeal for consecrated workers, who as ladies, would be able to access to the Zenanas, from which male missionaries are excluded. He pointed out how India's millions might be reached in this way.

Delegates were elected last week to the Orthodox Jews of New York to the Congress which is to be held in Munich, in August, to measure for the establishment of a Jewish settlement in Palestine. Dr. Herzl, of Vienna, was the head of the movement, has secured important concessions from the Sultan of Turkey, and cordial support of other potentates, and that the time is near when all Jews who are in Palestine will be combined in a State having full autonomy.

The Central Union Mission of Washington, D. C., is mourning the loss of its consecrated pastor, Mr. Herman F. Perry, who died at his home in Palo Alto, Cal. Mr. Perry had for several years devoted his life to work in various parts of the country. He was a member of the Central Union in the Crittenton Rescue Car "Good News" in his travels across the continent, and added greatly by his labors to the interest of the meetings. Of late he had given his services to the Central Union in Washington, and as he had considerable private means, he was able to give generously. He will be sadly missed.

The American Bible Society has issued its eighty-first annual report. It shows that the contributions of the Society to foreign lands during the year in money and books, amounted to $192,000. During the eighty-one years of its existence the Society has issued over sixty-three million copies of the Scriptures. The work is now so crippled by lack of funds. During the past year the total donations from individuals, church auxiliaries produced only $97,000, and the church treasuries received fell short of the actual expense by $77,200.33. The managers make an appeal for funds to enable them to send to the lands large consignments which are urgently needed by the missionaries.

TO SAVE THE CATTLE.

RERMAN aid has been sought in the struggle of South African farmers with the destructive rinderpest. Dr. Koch, the great bacteriologist, has been commissioned to go to Capetown, and endeavor to find out the identity and character of the microbe which causes the disease. It is known that the pest came from Asia originally, but that is all that is known of it. The important fact that it attacks the cattle, it is sure to kill. Dr. Koch has been experimenting for some time, but has hitherto failed to find the microbe which is responsible for the disease of the cattle. The distinguished bacteriologist has examined the blood, the flesh, the muscles of the affected animals with a microscope, but the microbe has eluded his search. His investigation, however, has had practical results. He has tried several methods of treating the diseased cattle and has discovered a mode of vaccination which, like the vaccination of the human subject, robs a dreaded disease of its worst power. From one of the sections of animals which have died of the disease, he has made an extract from which he vaccinates healthy cattle. At a specified interval, the cattle so vaccinated have been exposed to contagion, but have not taken the disease. So effective has the remedy proved, that even when the virus was introduced into their system by surgical means they were not affected. The vaccinated animal without an inoculation which proved fatal to one that had not been vaccinated, and the strength and quantity of the virus were increased so that an inoculation forty thousand times more potent than one that had sufficed to kill a non-vaccinated animal was introduced into the system of one that had been vaccinated, no effects were produced. This practical result will probably please the farmers more than any discoveries Dr. Koch has made as to the origin of the microbe. Although he has so far failed to find the object for which he went to the Cape, and has not been able to find and identify the microbe, his mission is entitled to be considered a success, since it is better to know how to cure or prevent a disease, than to have a theoretic knowledge of its origin. This principle is not limited to disease. It applies equally to theology. Innumerable learned volumes have been written in the vain dispute as to the origin of evil, and it is not yet satisfactorily explained how it entered the universe and reached the fall of the beings who introduced it to our world. But we have a better knowledge in the revelation of the divine Remedy which delivers men from sin.

The Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek wisdom, but we preach Christ crucified, unto Jews a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness; but unto them who are called, the wisdom of God and the wisdom of God. (1. Cor. 1: 22.)

A Bourge Counteracted.

An agricultural journal describes a strange removal of a pest without human intervention. It says that Maryland farmers have had their clover destroyed by hundreds of acres each year for four or five seasons past, the wicked work being done by a little beast of the sort, against which all the ordinary remedies were powerless. This spring a creature appeared again in large numbers, and the farmers appealed to the Entomologist for aid, declaring that they could not give it to them, and at the same time they would be forced to abandon raising of what has hitherto been one of their most profitable crops. An official investigation of the matter was immediately begun, and curiously enough, the first discovery made was that it will not do anything at all. The creature this year is afflicted with a minute insect which is working so effectively, that the pest is disappearing. Large numbers of the doomed weevils have already been attacked by the fungus, and each of them is a centre for the infection of his fellows. It is a plague from which there are no recoveries, and the prospects of entire extermination are hopeful. Thus, the farmers will probably be delivered from the evil that seemed to be beyond remedy. So it will be ultimately with all the evil in the world. It carries in itself the seeds of its own destruction: Sin when it is finished bringeth forth death. (James 1: 15.)

A Fortune for a Monument.

An effort has recently been made in the courts of Connecticut to set aside the will of a recently deceased citizen. The testator was a farmer who had led a very

it in this way, while the man's relatives are in need of money and some of them are being supported at the public expense. But the courts are unable to set aside the will and the monument is to be erected as the deceased directed. It is a deplorable waste of money but there appears to be no way of preventing it. The idea of a man laboring and denying himself comforts in order to have a grand tombstone seems to be the height of folly, but such folly is not new in the world.

There is one alone; he hath neither child nor brother, yet is there no end of all his labor; neither is his eye satisfied with riches; neither saith he, for whom do I labor and bereave my soul of good? This is vanity, yea it is a sore travail. (Eccles. 4: 5.)

On Fire at Sea.

The steamship Leona of the Mallory line, which sailed from New York for Galveston, Tex., on May 8, returned to New York without completing her voyage, bringing news of a fatal disaster. A fire had broken out in her cargo and thirteen persons had lost their lives. From the story of the look-out it was learned that it was in the dead of night that the fire was discovered. He had seen smoke curling up from one of the hatchways and, while he watched it a tongue of flame shot out.

hard life. He had a poor farm out of which it was difficult to get enough income for his support. But the man was industrious and extremely careful in his expenditure. By dint of hard work and a close watch over small savings he succeeded in accumulating a small fortune of six thousand dollars. Then he made his will. He had neither wife nor children, but he had two sisters one of whom was a widow, and both were in needy circumstances. He did not propose, however, to leave his money to them. He directed that after his death payment should be made of any just debts that he might owe at the time and his funeral expenses, and that with the remainder of his possessions a monument should be erected over his grave. He made his will in 1879 and one would have expected that after this, his life of toil and parsimony would have been changed. But he lived on in the same way, working hard and saving every cent he could. He died recently and his executor finds that after paying all debts there is a balance of ten thousand dollars which, according to the will, is to be spent in a monument. He is reluctant to spend

He immediately summoned the captain and measures were taken for extinguishing the fire. It was traced to the steerage deck where twenty-two passengers and several of the crew were sleeping. An effort was made to get to them, but the peculiar fumes of the smoke drove back the rescuers. Several of the passengers succeeded in making their escape, but others were overcome by the suffocating fumes and fell unconscious. Meanwhile, the engines were stopped and streams of water were directed upon the burning deck. It appears that there were several large consignments of matches among the cargo, and these being in proximity to bales of cotton, the fire was difficult to fight. Holes were cut in the deck and through them an incessant stream of water was driven. After a struggle lasting seven hours, the fire was brought under control. When the steerage could be explored, it was found that eleven passengers and two of the crew were dead. As it was impossible to obtain an accurate idea of the extent of the injury the vessel had sustained, it was deemed advisable to turn about and return to New York.

It was well that the disaster was no worse. The whole vessel and all on board might have perished in such a fire. Disasters like that sometimes occur in the voyage of life. When a Christian man has in his constitution the elements of sin, and does not exercise vigilance against his besetting sin, he is liable to fall. In the mercy of God he may be saved and restored, as Peter was, but his whole after life is maimed and crippled by the moral disaster.

If any man's work shall be burnt he shall suffer loss; but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire. (1. Cor. 3: 15.)

A Botanical Clock.

An interesting project has been planned by Prof. Ouisterhout, of Berkeley, Cal. He proposes to cultivate a circular garden in the grounds of the University of California. The professor who is one of the highest authorities on botany in the United States, believes that it will be possible to arrange plots of flowers around this garden in such a way as to tell the time of day almost as accurately as a clock. There is such a clock garden at Upsala in Sweden and another in Paris, but nothing of the kind has as yet been produced in this country. The idea is to experiment with various species of flowers until twelve varieties have been found which open their buds at certain times of the day. The professor says: "The flowers would be arranged like a clock, and in the early morning they would begin to bloom, the different varieties at different periods according to the light and heat. Gradually the opening of flowers would extend around the circle, until at night the circle would be all in bloom." We cordially wish the professor success in his pretty conception. His clock-garden would be a centre of interest for every lover of flowers. But how much more momentous would it be for the world, if he could give us such a progression and benefit as that which John saw in the new Jerusalem!

In the midst of the street . . . was there the tree of life which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded its fruit every month; and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations. (Rev. 22: 2.)

A Struggle in a Quicksand.

In the story of a traveler just returned from New Mexico, is a thrilling description of an escape from a quicksand. The story, as given in the New York Sun, relates the adventures of the writer and his companion who reached the bank of the Rio Grande in a buckboard. They were looking for a place to ford, when they met an old man who showed them a place where they might get across by carefully following his directions. These were that they must go straight across, not turning a step to the right or left, and not standing still for a single minute. If they failed in either of these matters, the old man said, nothing could save them from being swallowed up by the quicksand. "We understood," says the traveler, "and we drove down the bank and into the river. Once in the water there was no turning back. Our wheels went at once down to the hubs in the fine sand of the bottom, and our horses sank in it to their knees. Our only salvation was to keep going. The water was anywhere from one to three feet deep—the loose sands beneath it could have engulfed a cathedral and left no sign of where it had stood. Plunging into holes where the horses went under almost out of sight, and the water rose above our knees as we sat in the buckboard, again rising to shallows where the water ran only a few inches deep above the sands—we managed to keep our course. A dozen times the horses came to a standstill, unable for the moment to keep the buckboard in motion, and we could feel how fast we were sinking. Then by a great effort they pulled the buckboard along, and we were saved again. The breaking of a trace—a delay of ten seconds from any cause—and team and buckboard would have been hopelessly lost, and it would have been the end, too, of my companion and me. We were glad when we pulled up the opposite bank. I hope I shall never have an experience like that again." Even if he has not to cross a quicksand again, he may come to places in life where there is a danger more to be dreaded—the danger of losing his soul. Then he may remember the way he was saved from the quicksand, and escape by following the same directions.

Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee. . . . Turn not to the right hand nor to the left; remove thy foot from evil. (Prov. 4: 25.)

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

Eastern Marriage Customs

How the Ceremony is Performed Among the Hindus, Parsees, Moslems, and Other Ancient Oriental Peoples.

NO matter into what land one may penetrate or whatsoever races he may encounter, and even amid the most varied aspects of civilization, he is tolerably certain to find the institution of marriage or its equivalent dignified as one of the important events in life. Especially is this the case among Eastern nations, where the well-known grooves of ancient custom have made existence monotonous, and red-letter days are rare, being confined almost exclusively to betrothals, marriages and funerals. Among the Parsees of Hindustan, the wedding ceremony is very interesting. Children are betrothed whenever the parents find a suitable wife or husband, as the case may be. The "fire priest" then has to decide whether the match is a suitable one. When the children become of age, the "fire priest" sets the day for the celebration. In the Parsees' year there are only a few days which are considered proper for marriage ceremonies, and when these days do arrive, it sometimes looks as if half the people in the place were being married. One very queer idea is that the ceremony must always take place on the ground floor of the house. It begins by the young couple bowing to the ground before the "fire priests," after which they grasp each other by the hand. Torches are then lighted with fire, taken from the temple. These the priests wave over the heads of the couple, while sprinkling them with sacred water. Then the priests take a large veil, which they place over the heads of the couple and one of the priests. While they are under the veil, the other priests intone a chant addressed to the man, telling him to be faithful to his wife, and calling the blessings of the spirits of the water, fire and sun upon him. After this the theme of the chant changes, and addresses the bride. When the chant ceases the veil is taken off and the pair are made husband and wife.

With the Hindus, the marriage service is very much like that of the Parsees. In the selection of a wife, it is held as essential that she must have a fine, sounding name, no physical defects, beautiful hair, eyes, and teeth, and a sweet voice, besides being very graceful in movements and proportions. When the selection is made, and the planets and stars consulted, the Laganpatrika is made out, in which the names of the parties and the horoscope of each is cast and written, and the most suitable kind of marriage selected from the eight varieties that are prescribed in the Shastras. Before presenting himself to his wife, the bridegroom must prepare himself by prayers. On the wedding-day, the bridegroom takes his seat at one end of the hall on a raised platform in the house of the bride's father. Soon the bride enters, accompanied by her father, and takes her seat at the bridegroom's right hand. A young priest sets a censer of incense at their feet, symbolic of their warm affections. Before the bride a stone such as is used for pounding rice or wheat, is laid on the ground, this she steps on three times, to show that she thoroughly realizes the cares and responsibilities she is now about to undertake. Meanwhile, two priests stand waving lighted torches over her and repeating a prayer. After the bridegroom has made an offering of oil to the gods for giving him a wife, the priests hand him a torch, which he waves around her three times to typify that his love will always encircle her. The bride then makes her offering of oil and rice to the gods. A new garment is then put on the bride by her father, who fastens the foot of it to the foot of the bridegroom's dress. Bride and groom then clasp hands while the father binds them together with a cord made of grass, indicative of the marriage tie. After the bride has gone seven times around the fire repeating the marriage vows, the priest chants a hymn and the marriage is accomplished.

When a Mohammedan wedding is shortly about to take place, a curious ceremony is observed. First the bridegroom makes a present of betel leaves to the bride's relatives after which he visits the house in person, bearing other presents, in return for which he is fairly burdened with gifts of sweetmeats. On a second visit, he is welcomed on the threshold by the bride's mother, who ties a handkerchief about his neck and places a ring on his finger. Three days afterward he is invited to dine at table with the family, and sits next to his bride. Some of the salt on his plate he transfers to hers and she does likewise. On the wedding-day, the groom, accompanied by several friends, goes to the bride's house, taking with him that portion of the dowry which he has promised to pay. The witnesses are ready, and the bride and her parents being now in the room, all persons present unite in reciting passages of the Koran. Then comes the marriage contract. The bridegroom and the bride's deputy sit face to face, with one knee upon the ground, and grasp each other's right hand, raising the thumbs and pressing them together. A handkerchief is thrown over their closed hands, and then the priest addresses the principals in terms of exhortation. Prayer and reading from the Koran and traditions follows, after which comes the formal declaration or contract, which often varies in form. The next eight or ten days are passed in courtesies, present-giving, the preparation of dress and furniture and in entertainments to guests at the bridegroom's home. Then follows the bridal procession and the introduction of the wife to her new home.

Floral Bicycles.

It has entered into the minds of many lovers of floral decoration to make the bicycle a "thing of beauty," by decking it with wreaths and blossoms. At several of the bicycle parades and other public occasions of the sort, in recent years, some very pretty designs of this class of ornamentation have been witnessed, but the floral garniture of the wheel during the coming summer promises to eclipse all previous occasions. On June 5 next, a parade will take place in New York city, when it is expected the display of decorated wheels will be the finest ever seen in this country. Among the notable designs will be one of transforming the wheel, by means of white carnations, into the shape of a huge swan. A bevy of girls propose dressing in white, with their wheels elaborately decorated with scarlet and white roses. One bicycle will represent a miniature yacht, the mast being raised from the handle bar, a small foresail and bowsprit being also included; the body of the bicycle will be completely hidden in flowers. It is said that the floral decoration of the wheel is every season becoming more popular, both for parades and rides in the country, and it is certainly a very pretty and very innocent fancy. In ancient Greece and Rome, the youths engaging in the games or in rural sports were wreathed with garlands, and the Samoans of both sexes bedeck themselves with flowers on almost every conceivable occasion. There is no reason why our own young people, when they go a-wheeling, should not indulge the same pretty and picturesque fancy, if they so choose.

Babies at Church.

Mr. Moody, the celebrated evangelist, in a recent address at a meeting in St. Louis, spoke a few words concerning the mothers in the audience with babies. Instead of making them uncomfortable by singling them out for criticism, Mr. Moody said: "I am glad to see women with little babies here. If we can get the mothers of America we will capture the homes of the country. I would sooner shut out the old bachelors from my congregations than to exclude the mothers. But I have a request to make of these mothers who are here to-day with little ones in their arms. If you will relocate yourselves so as to get near the doors, then in case the babies get restless or become noisy you can step out into the corridor, quiet them, and then speedily return. If you do this no one will be disturbed, and you yourselves will not be much hindered in the enjoyment of the meeting." Again, just before the sermon, an usher, in trying to seat the people, asked three boys occupying seats in very easily keep its place, even to the board is tipped at a considerable angle so that every child in the room may make openings in the sand, showing blue "water" beneath, for the river, small seas, or use small mirrors and bits of silver paper or tin. The divisions of Palestine may be marked by card fences, and the roads by white corn few supplemental lessons on the mountains, bodies of water, the formation of the seacoast, and the divisions of the country will familiarize the class with its features and pave the way for their fuller enjoyment of the regular lessons. The sand can be used repeatedly and the board, if handled with care, will last a whole season.

Don't Underestimate the "Boys."

They will be men by and by, and men too, let us hope. "I have an idea," said Curator Smith of the Carnegie Museum, lately, "that we underestimate boys; when they are in earnest, they are capable of accomplishing almost anything that men can do. My own boyhood passed in a small village. Before I was ten, my taste for natural history had led me to attempt small collections of plants and insects; but there was no one to discourage me, no one who had the slightest sympathy with such pursuits. I think of the discouragements and even rejections that met me at every step and almost drove me to despair. No wonder, then, that I have a fellow-feeling for these boys, no wonder that I long to help them."

A Birthday Social for India.

The following letter from Mount Pleasant, N. J., may contain a suggestion for those who are trying to help India's suffering people:

Aroused by the appeals made through the Christian Herald, the Christian Endeavor Society of the Presbyterian Church, Mount Pleasant, N. J., determined to hold a Birthday Social for the presentation of the cause in this community. A mimeographed slip of paper, enclosed in an envelope, brought the following appeal direct to the members: "Eighty millions of suffering people in India appeal to Christian America for help. What will you do? You can help by putting within this envelope one cent for each year of your age, and by bringing it to the Birthday Social to be held at the Presbyterian Church, on Friday evening, May 4, 1897, at 7:45." Another mimeographed statement was issued to the citizens, were invited to participate in the effort. They realized amounts now to over $75, which has been day been forwarded to you for distribution, according to the plan which your journal has so successfully prosecuted. Plenty of discussion and action on the subject, a special sermon setting forth the great opportunity to American Christians, and committee service, and the promise of an interesting evening at the social, conspired to make the effort the great success that it was. The Christian Endeavorers of the same church issued tickets for the inscription: "Good for one loaf for the suffering children of India (Isa. 58:7)." and were successful in raising over $90 for the same fund. We commend these two plans to all Christian Endeavor Societies which are desirous of aiding our officers in their splendid work.

Sand Maps for Children.

There is a great deal of pleasure and instruction for the little folks in what is known as the sand-board map. Directions for making a sand-board are given as follows by Miss J. A. Dimock, in The Religious Telescope: A convenient size for the board is four feet six inches in length and two feet six inches in width, with a raised edge of about one inch. It may be made with very little trouble at home, or at a trifling cost by a carpenter. Paint the surface a bright blue to represent the waters of the Mediterranean, and form the

A man is too apt in regarding the tongue as a Christian's tool, to think of it only as a edged tool that is to lacerate and tear. There are times when it must be used for proof, when it would be sin to keep silence or refrain from protest, but the occasions are not so common as those when kindness and gentleness are required. He who is uniformly gentle and kind in speech acquires a power which gives added force to the words he feels induced to use on the rare occasions when he must give pain. The preparation of the tongue, as we are assured, is the Lord's work. "The tongue can no man tame," but it is a work that he is ever ready to perform when we seek his aid.

Hither, then, will the symbolic ephah be transported; here must it find its proper home and meet its final doom. But observe, it is not said that the ephah is to be carried to the city of Babylon, but to the land of Shinar. Nor is this a mere archaism. The ephah is not transported thither because there is a house ready to receive it: on the contrary, the house is to be built because the ephah rests there. In other words, when the Euphrates Valley becomes a great channel of trade, the new Babylon will not be already built as a metropolis.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

BY AMELIA E. BARR.

The Church of the Future.

It was found that no will, executed by Mr. Lloyd, of recent date existed, excepting the one made to satisfy the whim of a mentally sick man. This was not worth consideration. The other, made ten years previously, left everything to Steve after his mother's and sister's portions had been provided for. But Mrs. Lloyd declined all participation in her husband's wealth. She said she "had already more than she could wisely use and distribute," and she entreated Steve to take care of his father's accumulations and render out of them the charity belonging to God and the poor. As for Alice the portion assigned her as the bride of Lord Medway, was considered to be lawfully hers, but when this and all other claims had been satisfied, there still remained nearly six million dollars in real estate and in bonds and securities of the first class.

"It is your money, sir," said Mr. Phillips to Steve, "and you cannot put aside the claim it has on your wise management."

Steve flushed and trembled, and was aware of a sudden feeling of unlimited pleasure and responsibility. He had so often vowed not to encumber himself with riches, so often declared he would be terrified to be the steward of enormous wealth, so often and so sincerely asserted that his father's death would not enrich him, that he felt all at sea, tossed to and fro without rudder or anchor, drifting on circumstances which were totally unexpected and unconsidered.

And it was in this perplexity and perturbation of mind that he was subjected to the entreaties of his wife, mother, sister and lawyer. He was told by the latter that it would be an affectation of the worst kind to refuse his own on a mere social quibble. He was coaxed by the women of the family with plausible arguments, and half convinced that he had a mission to fulfil in the proper dispensation of so much gold. He was swayed by some internal charm—he knew not what—and became hourly more conscious of that authority which the mere possession of money creates. And thus pushed onward by unseen influences and outward powers, he gradually grew appreciative of his position and felt—though he did not realize it—the thrall of riches upon his spirit.

Jessie was now radiantly happy. The house on the avenue, the cottage at Newport, the carriages and horses, and steam yacht, were all within her grasp. The yacht fitted into Steve's life-long dream, and he was so eager to realize this dream of his own, that he did not oppose whatever his wife wished as its equivalent. Jessie now, therefore, took upon herself the gratification of her desires. And this time she resolved to leave nothing for the future to fret after. The poor little flat was never again visited. Some cheap appraiser valued its contents and gave her a "paltry little check" for them, and then she felt free to build a home that would be a fitting one for her position.

This resolve, of course, implied time to perfect it; but Jessie's apparent good fortune did not desert her. Circumstances occurred soon after Mr. Lloyd's death which placed the Lloyd mansion at her disposal, and she was thus enabled at once to live in the style she had resolved to affect, and also to keep a close watch on the progress and development of her future plans. For very soon after Easter Lord Medway married Miss Leavenworth, and this event made it possible for Mrs. Lloyd and Alice to take the long holiday of travel they desired. After their weary watch and seclusion it seemed indeed a most desirable change. But as long as Lord Medway was unmarried, there was a possibility of gossip which neither woman liked to face.

"It will be said we are ruining after him—that as he will not come to us, we go to him—Alice," Mrs. Lloyd ejaculated, "the thought of Europe at present is impossible. I wish it was not. I would like nothing better than a leisurely stroll through Italy with you."

Lord Medway's marriage was therefore, not an unpleasant surprise. Possibly Alice had yet some sore feeling about the matter, but it was not hard to hide it under the satisfaction arising from the freedom it permitted. Instantly they began to plan for a two-year's absence, and these plans included the occupancy of their New York and Newport homes by Steve and Jessie. Jessie considered this arrangement "a Providence," and Steve smiled at her consequential air and her ready appropriation of "Providence," but did not deny the exorbitant stretch of her claim upon a divine planning for her particular wishes. In fact all winter he had been gradually becoming more and more subject to his beautiful wife, and Jessie had almost begun to think him so far her bond slave, as to make further charming and conciliation unnecessary.

Early in May Mrs. Lloyd and Alice left America for Italy, and Jessie, though she did not voice the thought, said mentally, a very emphatic "Thank heaven for it!" When the steamer left its moorings she considered her enfranchisement complete. Hitherto, in spite of all her efforts, she had been conscious of Mrs. Lloyd and Alice as controlling forces. There were certain things she did not like to do in their presence. Their look of calm dissent spoiled her finest aggressions. Their polite refusals infused doubt and often failure into her daring innovations. She was now absolutely mistress of her desires and of six million dollars.

The first pleasure she gave herself was one which it delighted Steve to join her in. This was the settlement of her father in Steve's position as agent of Mrs. Lloyd's "Homes" and other charities, and the buying and furnishing of a pretty country place for her mother. The delight and surprise of the ageing McAslins was very genuine and very great, and Jessie might have learned from this experience that it is our labors for others that make us cheerful, while labor for self, always leaves behind a vague melancholy dissatisfaction.

Once more then Steve saw his idolized wife completely happy. In her splendid residence she ruled autocratically, she gave orders and received callers, and laid all sorts of splendid plans for her future social supremacy. And it was not difficult for Steve, in his own way, to follow her example. His way was the way of the sea. He was resolved to have the finest yacht that could be built. To be skipper of such a craft would be his most improbable dream come true. He spent his time in preparing for such a realization. To put off into space, to get out of sight and sound of all humanity but such as he could control, to leave all obligations behind him, to forget there were such things as letters, or papers, or plans, or settlements, to be alone with God and the ocean and the great winds that revel on the ocean, this was the heaven upon earth, which in certain moods the restless, vivid young man most ardently desired.

While he was in uncertainty about his father's money, and even while accustoming himself to the feeling and state and circumstance of his new position, he had kept out of the way of John McAslin. He heard of him, he read of him, but he made no effort to see him. And John would not force the old friendship between them. He knew the transforming power of gold, and thought it quite probable Steve would like to forget the past. Nothing was further from Steve's intention, but the fresh responsibilities he had assumed sat with difficulty on him, and he was hardly ready to be himself under them. One night, however, in the latter part of June, he went eastward to look for John. He knew where he was to speak, and he wished to see for himself if it was the old John unchanged. He wondered too how the opinions he had been wont to endorse would now affect him. He wished to try and test self by an unprepared judge and ordeal.

He found John in the lecture room of a church on Fourth avenue. There was no crowd here, no jostling, no bandying of jokes or greetings, no enthusiasm, and none of that ready oratory and disposition to deny, argue and answer back that was always a marked feature in more secular places of meeting. A fair proportion of the audience were women, but men and women alike were of that calm, respectable class which are not easily moved by any force outside the narrow circles of their own domesticities. Indeed, there was on the faces of many a set opposition, and as soon as Steve had listened a few minutes he was not astonished. For John was arraigning the Church in general in such language as could not permit any one to shirk the questions he touched.

"The Church has practically lost all effectual hold on the working classes," he said, "and there is an awful shipwreck of redeemed humanity of which the responsibility falls on the Church."

"Facts! Facts! Mr. McAslin," interrupted an aggressive-looking man near the platform. "We came here for facts, not for generalities. Take some great question of the day and tell us how the Church has neglected her duty."

"Socialism, for instance," said a woman by his side, with a little frightened laugh.

John bowed to her and accepted the proposition. "Socialism," he cried, "is the essential spirit of Christianity. Not the socialism of the Nihilist assassin, or the Communistic petroleuse, but the socialism of the New Testament. What is the socialism of the New Testament? It is the brotherhood of mankind springing from the fatherhood of God. It is the cheerful coming under the burdens of others 'in order to elevate and bless. It is the spirit of your own homes carried into the larger homes of your villages, towns and cities, of your country, and of the whole world. Say that you have sons and daughters? One may be clever and beautiful, another much less so. One may be healthy and strong, another weak and suffering. Is there therefore jealousy and oppression on your hearthstone? Not if a true family bond unites you. All will rejoice in the success of the brilliant brother or the lovely sister. All will unite to help the weak or the deficient. In a loving family who is more powerful than the baby? Who is better beloved and served than the invalid? This is the true socialistic spirit. If our hearts and our churches were filled with this spirit of Christ, we could do as he did and carry this influence into the world around us. This is the Gospel of the first century. It is the Gospel of the nineteenth, and will be the Gospel until time shall be no more. But this socialism the Church does not practice; she does not even preach it."

"Proof! Proof! Proof!" came from various parts of the assembly.

"I will give it. Take the words Liberty, Equality, Fraternity. Have not the shining letters of these names a tremendous fascination for all mankind? They are the most powerful words in any language. They stir the hearts of the suffering and the oppressed, like a trumpet blast from heaven. These words belong of right to the church. They are among her most glorious watchwords! They represent the powers and principalities of her sacred kingdom! What use has she made of them? None. She has left Nihilists, and Communists, and Positivists, and Anarchists, and Atheists, and a revolutionary press to preach from these charming texts. While the Church has been teaching men dogmas and wasting her time, and money, and arguments, and strength on creeds of men's making, she has left false teachers to preach a false Utopia from the most glorious words of her own holy charter."

"Then, John, you would have the Church preach socialism?" asked Steve, from his seat at the edge of the assembly.

The voice, the tone, the bright face of the speaker who stood with one hand on the back of his chair and the other stretched out toward the platform instantly raised in John's heart an access of enthusiasm.

"I would have the Church preach Fraternity! Equality! Liberty! as Christ taught them. The purest, truest, sweetest, loftiest socialism is in the New Testament. The Church of the future will have to preach it or be silent altogether. She will have to tell men to undo burdens and let the oppressed go, to break every yoke, that is she will have to preach against all the sins of cheap adulteration, unpaid labor, all the gains to which human flesh and and spirit have contributed, whether come from the sweat of the hands or sweat of the brain. She will have to creeds and dogmas, and feed the hungry and clothe the naked, and house the homeless. How many millions of are sunk in churches that are even against prayer, six days out of seven? And yet they are called 'the church of God,' and thousands of God's children have not where to lay their heads.

If Christ should suddenly stand upon Broadway and if the poor and homeless round him find Where would he lead them? To the church? Nay!

At those shut doors no Christ would 'stand knock?'

"Go on John," cried Steve. "I want more about the Church of the future."

"The Church of the future will teach men a different measure of success or of what is called success. She will honor those who grow rich without science, and then build a college as a gift like a sop to the Almighty, the public whom they have robbed; men must grow rich innocently, or she will not endorse them. She will not men Methodism, or Presbyterianism, Catholicism; she will teach them truth, tolerance, humanity to the animal world, and a boundless kindness and pity for the sick, the lame, and mentally deficient, the poor and suffering. She will not pass by any that may spring from the circumstances of the day, she will be justly angry and with unrelenting perseverance that wrong definitely stamped and fixed."

"You are setting the Church of the future a tremendous work. Who is able to do it?" cried a listener.

"We are to do it," answered John. "Every single one of us is our brother's keeper. It is our place to consider the signs of the times. It is our place to defend the rights of the poor and oppressed. Even now God is asking 'Whom will I send, and who will go with us?' of you will answer 'Here am I, send me?'"

"The power of the Church is in unity," said someone, and John lifted his word instantly and repeated it. "That is it. If the Church would only with out regard to name or creed would be invincible. The gates of hell should not, could not prevail against it. She might do anything she wished to. She might abolish drunkenness, she might make a dishonorable, unkind deed, unfashionable, and it would of fashion. The Church, as a united abrogating creed, standing on the foundation of the fatherhood of God and the consequent brotherhood of man, make any reform she wished to. How much reforms of all kinds are you may see for yourselves if you go from out of this meeting, not to your own comfortable homes but down into the haunts of those poor men and women who have no homes, and among that generation of miseries that inspire pitifully majestic Invocation of Bello.

Almighty God, whose justice like a sun shall carouse along the floors of heaven Raising what's low, perfecting what's unperfected, Breaking the proud and making odd things even The poor of Jesus Christ along the street In your rain sodden, in your snows unsheltered They have no hearth, nor roof, nor daily bread Nor even the bread of men, Almighty God The poor of Jesus Christ whom no man has ever called upon your vengeance much to wipe out not tears but blood, our eyes bleed Come, smite our damned sophistries so soft That thy rude hammer battering this rude Ring down the abyss of twice ten thousand

"I have nothing to-night to add to grand prayer," said John. He whispered the words, and yet they were audible through every corner of the room. And men and women with burning, and with eyes heavy with pity, looked wonderingly, gratefully even reverently at the man who moved their highest selves, and the quietly to their houses pondering words they might never, never forget though it might be the fires of repentance or of two late repentance that brought them again to remembrance.

TWO GREAT MOMENTS.

A Sermon Preached by the Rev. John McNeill at Fifth Ave. Stand forth in the midst. . .
 Presbyterian Church, New York. Text: Mark 3: 3, 5. Stretch forth thine hand.

IF you make this a story that runs something like this: A man who had a withered hand slipped into the synagogue and Jesus was there, and he singled him out and said to him, stretch forth thy hand, and somehow or another he believed in Jesus, and out came the withered hand into newness of life power. I feel if you tell the story as you have only told the hall, and not sure you have told the larger story.

It is a story that gathers round two utterances of our Lord, that brought them two great moments to that heart and history. First, Jesus said "stand forth in the midst," then the Lord did the Lord speak unto the second word that brought the "stretch forth thy hand." Stand stretch forth.

Stand forth in the midst." I take say I believe the first command, speaking, was the harder to obey. I think of it. It was on a day like the Sabbath of the Lord. The people to the synagogue as we go to it was a time-honored custom then still, as well as God appointed, and a fellow slipped into the synagogue and likely took a back seat—a poor with a withered hand. Of course I will account for what brought him to it was the name and fame of Jesus. No doubt as a healer of diseases he heard this, that, and the other about his poor withered hand almost to twitch with a kind of eagerness. Jesus came into the town, to get harm and at him.

A TEST.
 As you and I sit in our synagogues to use and wont and God's appointment, and as the generations before us throughout their generations, so were doing in Israel, and the man with the withered hand among the rest, Jesus and took charge of the service. I think that poor fellow with the withered hand sat in a back seat, and was in a tremble, and the thought was through the man like a shuttle through the loom: now there he is at last, he heard a good deal about him, but did not know him. I have nobody to place me. I have no money, but oh, I could get to speak to him. Suddenly he got more notice, perhaps, than I wanted. Jesus singled him out, fastened him with his eye, and said, "stand forth in the midst." I say, would you, any of you immediately have stood up? Try to think the man was like Jesus, flesh and blood, he knew where Jesus, just as you know where you are. I asked you to stand up in this church how many considerations would you put visible hands upon you to put you in your seat, and prevent you from standing forth. He would be tempted to himself, well now is this the way to handle me? Of course, I am a poor fellow, and my hand is withered, I did come in expecting to get an interview with him, but is this the wisest way is public way, this sensational way? It is a sensational way, interrupting a congregation at their devotions, and in a sensational way pulling me up in the middle of the singing. If he is the true Jesus, as he claims to be, and the Son of God, why does he not send a church member to speak to me and whisper that now or another he has got to know me, and he will be glad to see me in vestry at the close. Would he not be ashamed of us if he felt like that? For modest we get when it is coming to Jesus, but when it is sin that is in the wind, or folly or self-pleasing, or wordliness, why we will sin with a front like brass, we will trample on a father's warnings, a wife's or a mother's tears and entreaties, and go to sin and folly and the devil brazen faced, and who cares? But when it is coming back from sin and folly, limping, damaged, withered, dying, then it is turn down the lights and let no dog bark. We get so bashful, and we almost blush like a school miss if anybody taxes us with it. God help some of you to get over your unnatural modesty. "Stand forth in the midst." You cannot accuse Jesus of being a sensation-monger, you dare not bring your peddling little rules to him and find fault with him, he is master here. Stand forth in the midst.

SOCIAL FEARS.

I tell you that man was tempted to sit still. It was not easy to stand up. There were many who were saying at that very time that Jesus was an impostor and a deceiver of the people, and was simply using strange magical powers, if not devilish powers, for personal, unworthy, unholy ends. There were the Pharisees, the watchers, very likely looking round on him as if saying, will you dare? And may be, if he was a working man, some of those purse-proud Pharisees had supported him and his children since he lost his right hand, for many a purse-proud Pharisee will do a thing like that simply to have the fame of it and to conceal other things where criticism might fasten with a dangerous grip. It was not easy, and he did not feel it easy.

And then there would be that bugbear—it is only a mole hill and not a mountain—the thought of what will people say if I stand up, and this is done publicly. Of course he would know that the persecution that was beginning to gather round Jesus would gather round him if he became another certificate for Christ's power. Christ's tremendous spontaneous glorious claim to be the Messiah, the son of God long promised, come at last. Aye, he knew it all, and what will people say? What has kept some of you men and women back from an entire surrender into the hands of the Saviour, has been something like that, what will people say if you become a Christian? What will the Jones's say, and the Robinsons say, and the DeTompkins say if I become a Christian, if the revival gets hold of me? Sometimes there is a little vanity in there. Do not be so utterly conceited. If you did get converted New York would get over it. If some of you get converted, and I trust you will, if you get saved from sin, saved from self-righteousness, and become true living Christians.

PEOPLE WILL TALK.

But do you know what some people will say? The people who know you best will say that they are very glad to hear you have been converted, for it was high time. That is what they will say, it is high time. My dear brother, my dear sister, it is high time you were saved out of mere formality, or out of positive sin and wickedness. It is time you were saved.

Yet he got out of his difficulty, he rose and stood forth in spite of the watchers the Pharisees, in spite of all those fears of what people will say, or of the persecution that might gather around him he rose, and stood forth. I believe his withered hand compelled him. He cast a look at his withered hand, and I believe as he did so he would say, if I get that straightened out I would not need to care what they said. They laugh best who laugh last. Let them laugh that win, and the man who surrenders to Jesus at discretion is the winner. And up he got. I believe, dear friends, he had to grip the seat in front of him till his knuckles got white.

I believe the perspiration stood in beads on his forehead, but he was up. He rose and stood forth. I believe a gasp of hate swept round the synagogue from the Pharisees, but you might almost have heard the angels in heaven begin to cheer. Hell is baffled, heaven had won, another soul had surrendered to the Son of God.

Be you like him where you sit. Step clear, come out of the fear of man, or the wickedness, timidity, or stupid pride of your own heart, step clear out of every consideration that would keep you from surrendering into the hands of a powerful present Jesus. For I will shut my Bible, and I will shut my mouth, and I will never open Bible or lip to preach again if the very same Jesus, who did that work of grace and power on that man, is not present with us this afternoon, and giving us the same opportunity. Oh, dear men and women don't be watchers and fault-finders. God pity you. You cannot afford it. Come with your withered heart. This is

YOUR OPPORTUNITY.

He arose and stood forth. Then the Lord shot into him the second word that brought the blessing: Stretch forth thy hand. If he had not obeyed the first, he never would have got the second. There was a woman once came to Jesus, not as a lady to patronize him, she came as a broken helpless thing, and she slipped in behind him and touched the hem of his garment and immediately she was made whole, and as she was going to slip away home without standing forth in the midst, Jesus turned him about in the crowd, and when he turned round you are no longer behind, you are in front, and she had to stand forth in the midst, and fall down before him in the midst of a crowd, and tell him all the truth, and he sealed the blessing on her. "Daughter, thy faith saved thee, go in peace." This man before he got the blessing, that woman after she got the blessing, but first or last there is a need be. God help you friend to stand forth, to step clear, do not be cowed, don't be gagged, know your own mind, be true to your deepest convictions of guilt and need and hell desert, and come to Jesus in your heart, here and now.

He arose and stood forth. Noble confessor. Many of us would not have done it, and this story to Christ's glory would never have been written. He arose and stood forth, and the Master shot the second word into him, stretch forth thy hand, as if he would say: Now friend you have come out for me, and I will come out for you, and we will fight this thing together. Was it easy? Was it easy? If any of you arose, and stood up in this church, you would almost feel as though you were twenty feet high, standing up when everybody else sat, and especially looking round and watching you. You know how some of you are pinned down there, you dare not call your soul your own for fear of what somebody would say. You will do for the devil and the world and the church world, but will never do for the Son of God after that fashion. My words are sharp, but my heart is warm. The Lord give us courage: stretch forth thy hand.

INVOLUNTARY OBEDIENCE.

Was he not tempted to think something like this, as his thoughts went like the shuttles through the loom: now is this a right way, it is so like a trickster, he has never come down to look at my hand, or has never asked me about it that I might tell the whole history of the case, but in this cheap easy glib fashion he says, stretch forth thy hand. And may be a scalding tear fell on the withered hand to think that anybody could trifle with his misery, and add insult to his injury by making him a public spectacle like that. A look at his hand pulled him up, but when the Lord stood there and fastened his eyes on the man's eyes, and said stretch forth thy hand, I believe for a blessed minute he stretched forth his hand forgetting all about it. Looking and listening to that Divine Lord he felt he could do anything, and his hand came out, I believe before he knew. He could not tell you to this hour, if he came on this platform, just how it happened, but he could tell you it did happen. He would just say, Jesus stood there and looked straight into my face and said, stretch forth thy hand, and as I looked to him and listened to him I felt I could do the impossible.

There was no effort, no struggle. Please notice that there is no verse that says that the man gathered himself together for a magnificent effort and burst the bonds of his infirmity. Not by effort, not by works lest any man should boast. If he had done it by a great effort I believe that during the next week, as he went about telling his story, he would have dwelt more and more upon his effort until Christ's share in the business would have dropped out. It is wonderful how self creeps in with the best of us. I stand here, dear friends, for this position: I say this out of my own experience, that act of faith by which at last I came to an end of all struggling, and all striving, and all stress and strain, to be something and do something that I felt I never could be and never could do, that act of faith by which at last I ceased from self and simply took the Lord Jesus Christ at his word, it was

THE MOST EFFORTLESS THING.

I ever did. Just like a bairnie and its mother, a wee birdie to its nest, when at last you cease from struggling and straining and simply look and listen and take Christ at his word, is it not the most effortless thing you ever did? Perhaps you were weeks, perhaps months coming to it, but I challenge you, when at last you came to it, was not the first thing almost that you said, dear me, how simple it all is, I might have seen that long ago. He looked to Jesus and he listened to Jesus. As Paul would say, his faith came by hearing and hearing by the word of God. Now, dear men and women, I will not call you saints nor sinners nor backsliders, I will take nothing for granted, but I will just press this great fundamental point. Have you looked to Jesus, for there is no salvation otherwise? Cease from church, cease from respectability, from your own morality as well as from your wickedness, and look, look, look to Jesus, receive his word, rest on him and on the word on which he causes you to hope, believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. The moment, dear friends, that you cease from your righteous self that never did anybody any harm, or your more wicked guilty self, and look to Jesus in simple trust, that moment thy soul, like this man's withered hand, bursts the bondage of corruption and condemnation and passes out a new thing, into the glorious liberty and power of a child of God. The Lord bring it to pass while we speak, even as it happened here!

"Well, that is all. That is the end, or rather that is the beginning, for there is no end to it. It did not take five minutes, Deep called to deep, the deep of pity and power in Jesus answered by and trust in that man, and the thing was done, and Christ went on with the service, and pronounced the benediction. And then the people went away, and the watchers found their tongues, I have no doubt, and they began to buzz and criticize and find fault with Jesus. Jesus at his best does not please some religious people, because he breaks with them and their hard-and-fast notions and their pretensions. But there was one man, whether people criticized or spoke well or ill, there was one man, and may there be some one here to represent him, who went away with a bird singing in his bosom, the man who had crept in with the withered hand. He went out treading on air. To him the common air, the earth, the skies were opening paradise. He had seen the Lord. He had the token in his body and the sweet experience of rest and gladness in his soul, and he went away home.

When a workingman's right hand falls helpless, God pity us, how much falls into helplessness and misery along with it. Blessed be God for a Jesus who puts us right just where sin and the devil have spoiled us, body and soul. A verse in an old Psalm, I think, would often be on his tongue, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem," but just then he would slip in a shorter word and say, "If I forget thee, O Jesus, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth and my right hand forget its cunning." But we will not forget him, men and women, will we? We will not be ashamed of him, will we? No; blessed be God. We will go out to confess him, not in violent ways, but as he shall give us an opportunity, and he will make an opportunity for you. Thendon't fail him. Don't turn down the light. Show forth his power. Compel the very gainsayers to admit that something has come in and you are a new creature, old things passed away, all things become new, for you have looked to Jesus and you are living.

She Remembered Mont-Lawn.

A Reader Recalls its Beauties and Writes a Song for Our Children's Home.

SPRING-TIME has come again to Mont-Lawn and the trees are almost in full foliage, while the snowy dogwoods, the lilacs and syringas, and the banks of wild-flowers, make the place seem like a sea of blossoms. Soon the grassy lawn and green, sloping hill-sides will be the play-ground of our little tenement guests, who come up from the hot city to enjoy their ten-days' outing at our Children's Home. Mont-Lawn never looked more beautiful than it does this spring, and it is not to be wondered at that those who have ever been there should recall it with feelings of pleasure and delight.

A reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who has visited Mont-Lawn, sends the following letter, which will be read with interest by all who have been identified with our Children's Home work, either as patrons or visitors. She writes:

I wrote these verses during a time of sickness. The words can easily be sung to the tune of "Home, Sweet Home," to be used by the children at Mont-Lawn. My two sisters, Florence and Ella, have enjoyed a trip to Nyack, and they often sing over the songs on the leaflets that were used at the Home. I also spent a day there and remember the scenery as the grandest I have ever seen, and also the Christian influence surrounding the children. I am sure it will leave lasting impressions on a great many of their lives.

Oh, sing, all ye children,
With voices loud and clear;
And ever remember
The friends who brought us here
To see nature's glories,
In sweet midsummer days,
The trees and the flowers,
For which we offer praise.

CHORUS:

Home, home, sweet, sweet home,
Oh, sing little children of this our Christian home.

Oh, sing all ye children,
Your hearts and voices raise;
The birds singing sweetly,
All join us in our praise.
The woods and the river,
So beautiful to see,
All speak of the Giver
Of good to you and me.

Dear Lord, bless our parents,
And teachers all so dear,
And bless all the children
Who gather here each year.
And when in life's closing
We may no longer roam,
Oh, then may we gather,
In that bright heavenly Home.

CHORUS:

Home, home, sweet, sweet home,
Oh, sing little children of this our Christian home.

—ALICE E. C.

Many friends who have taken a pleasant interest in the work of our Children's Home in the past three years, are now writing, making inquiries concerning the date of reopening the Home, and applications from city missionaries in behalf of poor tenement children are already coming in, begging that their little charges may have the benefit of a holiday at Mont-Lawn. One lady, (Mrs. E. L. Sutherland of Parkville, N. Y.), mindful of the needs of the little guests, sends this letter:

I send a box to-day to the Bowers Mission. I wish the little slum children to have the contents. It is only a little, but it is given willingly, and I hope and pray that God may richly bless the efforts put forth to reclaim fallen humanity.

The box, which contained a quantity of clothing, maple sugar and apples, will be sent to the Matron of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y., to whom all such gifts for the children should be addressed. Money contributions in aid of the work can be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York. Outdoor Light

Nothing adds so much to the attractiveness of a village or home and safety from night prowlers, as well lighted streets and grounds. They are secured by the STEAM GAUGE & LANTERN COMPANY Tubular Globe Street Lamp, which is cheap, ornamental, burns 4 hrs for a cent, and almost takes care of itself; will not blow out.

We make Tubular Porch, Carriage and Street Lamps besides, and all of them are as good as the Street Lamp. Your dealer has, or can get them for us for detailed description. Mention this paper.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

MISSION TO THE RICH.

It may well be doubted if there is any more thoroughly Christlike work for humanity being accomplished in our time than that which clusters about the settlements in some of our large cities. Every conception is in the spirit of the poor: who put aside the glory of the past and came down to earth, bringing the resources of nobility of character, and gentleness of soul, and them as a flower does fragrance for the poorest and weakest and meanest of mankind. So the social settlement happened in the very heart of slum life, where human life is hardest to bear, and a glimpse of anything pure and holy is indeed, is peopled usually by men and women of culture and refinement, and from whom leave homes of luxury and ease, and for Christ's dear sake, deny the happiness of associations with they have been born and reared, and that by personal example and that they may make the Christ life possible and beautiful to the most depressed of their brothers and sisters.

One of the most striking of these efforts of long Christianity incarnate in the face of poverty and sin, is Hull House, Chicago, and the angel in chief of Hull House is Miss Jane Addams. It is now ten years since this institution was founded, and it has become one of the institutions of the city.

One of the things that impresses me about the work of Miss Addams, is her first idea in starting the work was not so much to help the poor as to help the rich. Her large soul ached for the idle idleness of many wealthy society girls who seemed to have no worthy life in life, and who sadly needed to be brought into practical sympathy with their creatures. It has always been her belief that the work of Hull House benefits the teachers and workers quite as much as it does the poor people for whom the service is rendered. Some of the most enthusiastic and effective workers in the Christlike service are young women, up to the time of their becoming interested in this work, had led merely dissipated lives. It has developed them and glorified them as much as it has blessed any of the wretched girls of the slums and cellars, to whom they have ministered with such tenderness and devotion.

The young women have found that their wit and talent they possess could be put to some where into play in this new world. One girl who has been all her life accustomed to the highest world of fashion, and who is an expert in social matters, has developed a remarkable ability in imparting graceful and elegant manners to the street hoodlums.

Another young college girl utterly annihilated the taste for dime novels among the slum boys, by a course of talks on the Legends of Charlemagne and his Paladins, which she made so interesting, that these urchins who had never heard a historical lecture in their lives, listened breathless and fascinated. Roland was the hero, whose adventures particularly delighted them. After the narration of his death, the boys hung about the room disconsolate. At last one remarked, sorrowfully:

"Well, it is no use coming any more, Roland's dead!"

But Hull House is not dead, and its devoted workers are alive to their finger tips, and things new and old are brought fresh out of the treasures of the minds and hearts of these self-sacrificing women, that capture the imagination and hold the affection and enthusiasm of the vigorous young life that would be otherwise running wild into evil. The whole object is to present the possibilities of a Christian life, pure and noble, beautiful and gracious before eyes to whom such a life is unknown.

Like all other good things, Hull House has been a growth. Ten years ago it consisted of only two young women who rented a few rooms in a building that they shared with a desk manufactory, but a wonderful transformation has been wrought. First the desk factory vanished and Miss Addams and Miss Starr, with their fellow-residents, occupied the whole of the old-fashioned Hull homestead. Then a wing was added with club rooms in it, and lecture halls and gymnasiums; then another wing at the rear for a restaurant and public bakery, where soups, cooked meats and other edibles could be had all ready to take home for less than the price of buying and preparing the raw material. Then a children's house was built to accommodate the Day Nursery, the Kindergarten and the Picture Gallery. This great mass of buildings with all its beehive of earnest workers and gracious influences have been the outcome of the intelligent love and good will of two Christian women.

Are there not other men and women of wealth, of college breeding, of rich gifts of conversation, or teaching, or helpful fellowship, who are weary of simply eating and drinking and keeping themselves sleek and comfortable like a fat ox, who will take courage and heart at this glimpse of a wonderfully rich investment in humanity? For after all, the richest investment one can make in this world, the one that is sure to pay back the largest dividends on the capital put in, is an investment in humanity. No other soil is so fertile, or will yield such speedy and satisfactory return.

Free to all Readers.—The New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

As stated in the last issue the new botanical discovery, Alkavis, is proving a wonderful curative in all diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disordered action of the Kidneys and urinary organs. The New York World publishes the remarkable case of Rev. A. C. Darling, minister of the gospel at North Constantia, New York, cured by Alkavis, when, as he says himself, he had lost faith in man and medicine, and was preparing himself for certain death. Similar testimony to this wonderful new remedy comes from others, including many ladies suffering from disorders peculiar to womanhood. The Church Kidney Cure Co., of No. 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, who so far are its only importers, are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. To prove its wonderful curative powers, it is sent to you entirely free.

The Art of Living Tranquilly.

HE luncheon table was daintily spread and the guests, assembled to do honor to a sweet-looking woman, a friend from across the sea, were very attractive in their pretty spring toilettes. The table was decorated with apple-blossoms, and the meal, served in courses, was eaten in a leisurely fashion, from the first delicate and appetizing dish till the last. Lingered over ices and bon-bons, Mrs. Manchester, the President of our village literary club, began a conversation which was carried on later in the drawing-room beside the open fire, where coffee was served in tiny cups.

"Mrs. Elwell," said Mrs. Manchester, addressing the guest of honor, "can you tell us the secret your country-women possess, of never being hurried, of living tranquilly, of being always serene and composed? For I am not mistaken. Whenever I go to Scotland, and I go almost every summer, I am re-impressed with the easy and gracious air of repose which characterizes the household life. It is very different from ours, which is somehow always at high pressure."

"You are more than kind," Mrs. Elwell replied, "but there does not seem to me to be any secret about it, except that perhaps we do not try to accomplish so much in a given time as you do. Nor are we quite so disturbed about keeping everything up to a certain scale of appearances. We like solid, old-fashioned comfort, and our lives go on with a certain serenity in grooves furrowed by our fathers before us. Our houses are plain or elegant as it happens, and we are not disturbed by any anxiety to make them as handsome as those of our neighbors. Perhaps our lives are strongly individual. But I am aware of ungraciousness when I seem to be critical, I, whose every day in America has been a satisfaction and a delight. Pray pardon me."

"If I may speak," said Adela Merrifield, a bright girl who has just been chosen to fill a vacancy in our college, and who is studying her future field of work, on which she will not enter until the autumn, "I will suggest that the art of living tranquilly went out when the need of catching the morning train came in. Our business life is all flurry and flutter and haste and speed. The man of the house must be at the station to take the 7.20 train in the morning, fortunate if it be not the 6.15. Everything is timed by the peremptory whistle of the train to town."

"Breakfast is a fight and a scramble. There is no thought of family worship. That implies repose, leisure, a dignified cessation of work, while the reading and singing and prayers go on. And our modern life has very little dignity. We begin our days in a rush, and spend them in a reckless race, and finish them in a whirl! It is all a hurly-burly, and nobody looks sweet and peaceful any more. Tranquility is a lost art. It has vanished from the face of the earth."

"Does thee think so, Adela?"

The speaker was a placid-looking woman a little beyond middle age. Her thick, white hair was plainly parted above a forehead which showed few lines; her soft, brown eyes were full of loving gleams, her voice was gentle as a breeze that just stirs the pines on a summer evening.

This beautiful woman wore the dress of the Society of Friends. Her countenance was a mirror of calmness and her atmosphere, for each of us has an atmosphere, was that of tender serenity.

"Ah! Cousin Priscilla, I had forgotten you," said Adela. "I must admit that you are an exception to the common rule. You are never worried or flustered, or in haste, yet you have a great deal to do. How do you accomplish so much with so little fret, so little haste? The sweet Friends' speech has something to do with it, I fancy."

"A hot temper may masquerade behind a thee-and-thou as well as elsewhere," remarked Mrs. Armstrong, before Priscilla had time to reply. "It is more than the way of talking, I know."

"When He giveth quietness, who then can make trouble?" said the Quaker lady, softly. "I have long endeavored to live as if my Lord were just beside my door, to keep my heart as if it were an inn for him to rest in when he is weary, to look at life as a school for study, but not as a battle-ground where the weaker must go to the wall. I have learned to do what I can and to leave the rest. There are other days to come, if I don't finish my work today. And I live in love with my fellow-creatures, and Christ makes me happy in service done for his little ones."

"Dear Priscilla!" whispered Mrs. Elwell stroking the white hand of the beautiful friend. "We might all take lessons from thee!"

"I fancy," said Mrs. Robert Creighton, "that I could live tranquilly if I were not the mother of three small boys. But what with their adventures and their escapades and the unexpected things which befall them, and the racket they make, it is perfectly useless for me to be anything but restless. Our house is half the time like a place swept by a cyclone."

"Thee has three splendid boys, Agnes," observed Priscilla, comfortingly.

The young mother smiled. She had a right to rejoice in the sturdy, small chaps of whom she sometimes complained, for they were healthy little fellows—manly, truthful, and obedient. One could afford to sacrifice a little domestic ease for the sake of such sons, bound to grow up gentlemen like their father: men, deferential to women, kind to the poor, honest in business, and God-fearing all through. With the sudden appearance at the door of these laddies, who, on their way home from school, called to escort their mother back to her own abode, our pleasant luncheon party dispersed. The talk and the mutual exchange of views had diffused tranquility over our mood, for at least that day.

Dear Sirs:—An old friend of mine handed me a couple of small vials of Tartarothine some time ago and I tried it on myself, having suffered from Rheumatism for several years. I assure you I was so pleased with its effects that I procured a full sized bottle, and since taking it I have been entirely free from Rheumatism during the past year. I so observed that it is not surpassed by any other preparation as a PROMPT and EFFICIENT diuretic; besides it is pleasant to a minister. Physician and Emperor.*

TIBERIUS had heard of this man in his wicked seclusion at Caprae—a Jewish soothsayer, he was told, a fanatic, a dangerous fellow, well known the way when out of the world—heard and forgotten long ago. Of possible interest was the life and death of a Jewish peasant to this mighty emperor of mightiest Rome, and yet to would be hard to find a slave in all the place who would exchange places with Tiberius. Tiberius himself knew he knew himself unloved, unpitied, and with the pains of swift-coming death, loathsome with the corruption of age while yet cursed with breath, watched his attendants with a terrible gaze, reading his sentence of death in their averted eyes. Clothing was torn, yet he forced himself to endure a toilet every day. Food and wine were upon him, yet he ate and drank with determination. Sleeping and waking, he was haunted by the faces and names of his countless victims; mingling with his attendants, their ghastly blood-faces hung over his couch at night; with withered fingers they beckoned him from behind the shoulders of counselors in the morning. He longed to seek aloud of his misery, to wail lament even as a slave beneath the hand who would listen? Who in all the world of mortals or of spirits was there whom he could unburden himself to?

The physician Charicles desires an audience with thee, divine master." And the emperor bowed low before the royal physician.

"The physician Charicles," repeated Tiberius, rousing himself with difficulty from his frightful reverie. "Who is there who needs or desires the presence of Charicles?"

"I wish to be to the gods, all are in prayer," replied Stephanion. "The wise man comes not to exercise his craft, but to look upon the face of his master, since there is no greater joy to him in all the world."

"Fetch me a mirror," commanded Tiberius. "But no—how do we seem to-day, emperor? The truth, knave—if thou dost find grain of truth in thine entrails."

"Aver, divine master, the wisdom of the ancients and the majesty and beauty of the gods irradiate thy glorious countenance."

Tiberius made an impatient gesture. "Bring parrot!" he muttered. He saw a gold-bordered purple mantle about his shoulders. "Drop yonder mirror; the sun glares in impudently, admit the man to my presence." He turned his countenance into an artificial smile.

"Good Charicles, do not kneel: it is I to receive thee, and to see the passing years have used thee not at all."

"It is needless for me to ask after the health of the illustrious master of the world; it needs but a glance to assure me," responded Charicles, kissing the hand of the emperor.

"Sayest thou so?" said Tiberius, waving his hand quickly away. "Yet there those who profess to think me immortal, but it seemeth to me that man can scarce be ill who eats, and sleeps with the appetite of youth."

"The word was never spoken," said Charicles, cautiously studying the face before him. The swollen purple veins, the livid lips, the heaving breast, all pointing to his intelligent eye the story of a laboring pulse which he had managed to touch as he kissed the royal hand.

Tiberius was not looking at his visitor; his eyes were fixed on the space directly above his head: the expression of his face grew thoughtful.

"Eat, drink, and sleep well," continued Charicles in a somewhat louder tone, "the body must needs be in perfect accord with the indwelling spirit, all the parts of the machine working harmoniously. Thou hast in thy wisdom seized the whole meat of the matter."

Tiberius dropped his eyes with a hollow laugh. "If thou wast asked to prescribe for a man, good Charicles, who was constantly plagued by visions of the dead," he said, pulling at his pillows uneasily, "what wouldst thou do for him? There is in the palace a—a slave who constantly beholds the faces of murdered men, ay, and of murdered women—livid, ghastly, some with dagger-thrusts in the breast, others with swollen faces as of those strangled, and most terrible of all, a woman—" here his voice dropped to a husky whisper, "a woman whose discolored skin scarce covers the bones of her frame, and whose skeleton hands are ever outstretched as if to seize him!"

"A most unfortunate slave—a most unhappy slave," said the physician, gravely. "Nay, I can do nothing for such an one: death is the best remedy."

"A wise man art thou, O physician. I also have said it. But be the hour of dissolution far from us, who have reached the age of wisdom, and who after many follies are at last prepared to enjoy the serene pleasures of a riper age." Thou shalt sup with me this night, good Charicles, that thou mayest drink to the prosperity of the four and twentieth year of my reign."

At midnight of that same day the prefect of the praetorian guard received the anxiously-awaited report of the physician.

"The emperor," declared Charicles solemnly, "cannot at the longest survive more than two days: he is even now a dying man."

"Sayest thou so?" cried Marco with manifest delight. "Art thou sure? They tell me that he remained long at table to-night, and ate and drank more than his wont."

The physician shrugged his shoulders. "That is also true," he said. "So might the mariner, who knows the hull of his vessel to be gnawed by the tooth of the hostile rock, hoist sail to the wind, as if by any chance he could cheat the hungry deeps that await him. The emperor is dying. I, Charicles, have said it; and yet it is not I that have said it, but the Fates who have spun and measured the thread of his life, and whose shining blades are even now uplifted to sever it."

THE time set for the close of the entries in our Sunday School championship competition is near at hand, but we are still receiving letters from pastors, superintendents, teachers, and parents, showing that the interest aroused by the friendly contest has by no means abated. A good record received this week is that of Mr. Edward Graham, Baltimore, Md., who has attended the Franklin Street Presbyterian Church Sunday School of that Cubans Needing the Gospel.

Spanish atrocities in Cuba have brought over to the city of Tampa, Fla., thousands of refugees who come to join many others of their countrymen already in the same place. They arrive in a most pitiful condition. The majority have lost all they had on their struggling island. Many come after having seen fathers, brothers, husbands or children butchered by the Spaniards. Women and children come destitute of everything, after having escaped death and the horrors of war. The majority are dressed in mourning.

Mr. J. V. Cova, a Baptist Cuban Missionary of Tampa, Fla., has undertaken to receive them here with the comforts of the Gospel of peace.

There are in Tampa altogether about 14,000 Cubans, and it is a great responsibility for Christians to leave the spiritually uncared for. Mr. Cova preaches the Gospel to them twice a week. He proposes to establish a day free school for the children, who have never seen a Bible; to have teachers, books, etc.; and to have these little refugees under Christian influence, and by this means to reach their parents also.

FANNY CROSBY'S LATEST HYMN.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is privileged to lay before its readers the beautiful words of the latest hymn written by the aged and blind poet, Fanny Crosby, whose whole life, spent in darkness, has been a bright and shining light to countless thousands. Her hymns are sung in every land, but none will be more widely appreciated than this latest production of her gifted pen:

NO MORE!

MY soul looked out of its windows,
And longed, like a weary dove,
Forever to fold its pinions
And rest by the streams of love,
That flow in that blissful region,
Where parting and tears are o'er,
And they who have passed its portals
Shall "hunger and thirst no more."

A vision of joy stole o'er me;
I floated as if on air,
Till, borne on the wings of angels,
I stood in a world most fair.
I felt that my wish was granted—
That parting and tears were o'er;
And I was among the ransomed
That "hunger and thirst no more."

"Not yet," said the gentle Shepherd,
"Is the rest that remains for thee.
Return to thy work unfinished
And gather the lambs for Me.
And then, when thy task is ended—
Where parting and tears are o'er,
Thy spirit, arrayed in glory,
Shall 'hunger and thirst no more.'"

— FANNY CROSBY.

Recognizing the uptown movement of New York City, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has recently opened a new ferry between Jersey City and West Twenty-third street in addition to the old ferries at Cortlandt and Desbrosses streets. The new ferry house is a most complete structure, with two substantial ferry slips, with overhead passage ways to the saloon decks of the ferry boats, and two large and handsomely furnished waiting-rooms. One of the most attractive features of the new accommodations is the cheap cab system introduced and maintained by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which will be much appreciated by the passengers of the road.

The beautiful double-decked boats are marvels of elegance and comfort, and altogether this new ferry will add much to the already attractive features of this popular route, and will be a great convenience to the traveling public.

Consumption

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption, have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I see you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for good of others. I have those around me whose health value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a beneficial preparation. Yours heartily, Spurgeon.

AS GUESTS OF THE SHAH.

How Party of European Travelers Were Greeted by Persia's Ruler.

THREE young Englishmen, John Fiske Fraser, E. Edward Lunn, and F. H. Lowe, who are now journeying round the world, relate in Travel remarkable experiences at Teheran, capital, where they were the guests of the Shah. They write:

We received an invitation from the Shah to visit the royal palace. It was very to magnify our importance in the presence of Persians, who always treat a man according to the size of his name. Accordingly we went in some very gorgeous yellow carriage, and accompanied by an escort from the British Legation. As we entered the gateway of the Khia-ban-i-Almasieh, a string of saluted us as though we had been persons extraordinary. They had come and were prepared. But advanced quicker than the signal passed along to receive visitors. As we came upon soldiers tumbling out of the guard-room, struggling in the streets and hastily presenting arms, were distinctly of the awkward order.

By various officers of the Court, led across the gardens, delightfully fresh, with long black pines and shadows over the verdant grass, a patch of green we had seen for a little lake. The flower-beds were with geraniums. The birds twittered the trees. The eccentrically built, brightly painted buildings rose on every side, it was charming.

As we reached the main entrance, and our shoulders straight while passing through another crowd of crouching men, we came to the great staircase leading to the State apartments. It is a staircase. The walls are decorated with millions of tiny bits of mirror, white plaster, presenting innumerable facets, so that the whole glitters like this was distinctly Persian.

We could not speak, save through an interpreter, with the Governor of the Palace, who was our guide—a stout, slow-gentleman with walnut-dyed hair, whiskers—but there was a look in his eyes, though he would say, "See this door," when we were ushered into the Throne Room. It was framed with mirrors of all sizes and at all angles, the walls as the walls, so that you could yourself reflected in a thousand attitudes. A man, however, would go mad to live here, watching himself, that himself in four hundred positions, the back of his head reflected in five, dancing up, he could behold himself, wing, flylike, on the ceiling. Three to wool-work pictures, such as our fathers used to illustrate Moses in the bulrushes, and which remain in the back sitting-rooms, monumental industry and lack of the artistic declared at us from golden frames. There was a pile of things which of us would care to own, but in the Shah's Palace, were regarded as marvels of ingenuity and skill. There were plenty of silk curtains, gold decorations. There was a complete of water, while from the window one side of the room was a delightful view of the garden was in. We would have lingered here, everything was tasteful. But a given that the gates of Paradise had been opened for us. We bowed the Shah should be honored.

Then open were the great doors, where in the Throne Room, a room of jewels and gold that would be in Aladdin. The carpets were of chairs of gold. There were fifty chairs. One of us sat with quite a plant air in a chair with its back and legs studded with pearls, rubies, and emeralds, worth $100,000. One hundred thousand pounds seem a tolerable large sum of money. But in the Throne Room of the Shah, it dwindled to a mere nothing. And was it surprising? We were in no dream, and no visions were about. We stood and probed and inspected and discussed and marvelled over one of the seven wonders of the world, the famous Peacock Throne. In the old marauding days it was at Delhi, one of the thrones of the Mogul Emperors. It is the size of a massive bed, with seven legs. It is entirely of gold, most exquisitely chiselled and encrusted with thousands of precious stones. The two steps, sides, and legs glisten with jewels. The raised back is nothing but a mass of gems, with a scintillating circular star on the top, and two little birds, which can by courtesy be described as peacocks, on either side. It is the most costly throne in the entire world, and even the pillow on which the king reclines is entirely covered with pearls. Many people say its value is £3,000,000. But if we knock off a modest million, and say that were it put up to auction, it would no doubt bring £2,000,000, it is still too dear for any tourist to purchase as a memento.

"The Throne Room, however, is something more than a room containing a throne. It is a museum—the most peculiar museum that fancy can conceive. It has hundreds of priceless treasures, and on either side with these are the thousands of tinselled, gaudy curiosities, rubbishy, useless gew-gaws that the late Shah picked up during his European travels. There are musical boxes, japanned trays, common dinner services, oil paintings bought at exhibitions with the numbers not removed, and actually big vulgar advertisement sheets, which gained a position in such a place because there was plenty of startling color about them. Also there were several oil paintings done by the hand of Nas-ed-Din Shah. His Majesty's strong point was not art. In this room, as elsewhere in the Palace, everything was bizarre and ludicrously incongruous. Fancy an old green-painted frame of an iron bedstead standing in a room crowded with jewels! Fancy a table having common tacks to fasten the sheets of gold with which it was covered!

"There were bowls full of pearls, which one could run through one's fingers like a bowl of rice. There was a globe of the world containing seventy-five pounds of gold and 51,366 gems that cost £320,000 to make, and is valued at £947,000. The sea is of emeralds, Persia is composed of turquoises, Africa of rubies, India of amethysts, England and France of diamonds. There were pearl-bedecked crowns, superb tiaras, jewelled swords, heaps of uncut stones, a startling breath-snatching array of wealth which, without exaggeration, is said to be worth between £40,000,000 and £50,000,000. Also we noticed several penny tooth-brushes."

Fainting Spells and Dizziness Follow La Grippe.

WE HEAR LESS ABOUT THIS DISEASE THAN FORMERLY, BUT IT IS STILL VERY PREVALENT.

From the New Era, Greensburg, Ind.

A noteworthy instance of the fallibility of even the most skillful physicians is furnished in the case of Mrs. J. E. Smith, of Greensburg, Ind.

For four years Mrs. Smith was afflicted with a nervous affection that finally left her almost completely helpless and which the physician who first attended her said positively could not be cured. Subsequently, a number of physicians in this and other cities, declared her case to be hopeless.

To-day in spite of the verdict of the doctors, and without their aid, Mrs. Smith is perfectly well. To a New Era reporter she told the story of her extraordinary recovery.

"Five years ago I had a severe attack of la grippe, followed later by another. During the four years following, my health continued to decline, until finally I was hardly able to move.

"After having the grippe," said Mrs. Smith, "I was able to be about for awhile, and to do some work. But in a short time after the second attack I began to experience nervousness, and often had fainting spells, my trouble being similar to hysterics. I gradually grew worse, and in a short while I became subject to such spells of nervousness that I could do no work, being scarcely able to move about the house. I could not sleep and could not eat. I would lie awake at nights, my muscles twitching continuously. My physician called it nervousness of the throat and breast, and after treating me for several months said that my case or any case like mine positively could not be cured. Different physicians in Greensburg and other cities who attended me, agreed that my case was hopeless. For three years I lingered in misery, trying different doctors and remedies, but none did me any noticeable good. Finally my druggist advised me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, which was so highly recommended by newspapers. As a last resort I tried them, thinking that if they did me no good death might soon give me relief. The first dose helped me, and with every dose I improved. I took about three boxes and a half and was completely cured, as you see me to-day, perfectly healthy and able to do all my own work."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are also a specific for troubles peculiar to females, such as suppressions, irregularities and all forms of weakness. They build up the blood and restore the glow of health to pale and hollow cheeks. In men they effect a radical cure in all cases arising from mental worry, overwork or excesses of whatever nature. Pink Pills are sold in boxes (never in loose bulk) at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists, or direct by mail by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

We will give absolutely free $5.00 in gold. This is a great opportunity for every man, woman, and child to make money easily. All you have to do is to think of the right word.

Persons living in a small village have just as great an opportunity as those living in large cities. In this contest you do not have to consult dictionaries or encyclopedias. There is no tedious work making a long list of words. Only one word is required. The above sentence is taken from a great editorial. The missing word is simple; see if you cannot find it. To help you we give an example, and tell you that the word is not bill. Undoubtedly you would write it as follows: "What bill have you settled?" but bill is not the missing word; but it is a little, easy word.

Conditions.—To enter this contest you must send us 25 cents, silver or money order or 15 two-cent stamps, for a six months' subscription to our great popular monthly, FASHIONS AND FIXINGS, 36 pages, edited by Mrs. Mary K. The sentence will be printed complete, together with the names and addresses of the successful contestants. In the August issue of FASHIONS AND FIXINGS, send 25 cents in silver or money order or 15 two-cent stamps, for a six months' subscription, and your guess as to what is the missing word in the above sentence. There are no other considerations or conditions.

If you guess the right word you will receive Five Dollars in gold by return mail.

This offer is simply made to introduce our great family magazine into homes where it is not now known. Send 25 cents or 15 two-cent stamps and your word today. Money refunded if you are not perfectly satisfied.

THE CENTURY'S LONGEST REIGN.

English-Speaking Peoples Preparing for the Great Victorian Jubilee Celebration in London this Month—Honors to the Empress-Queen.

SIXTY years have passed away since Alexandrina Victoria ascended the throne of Great Britain, and the anniversary of her accession in June, 1837, is this year to be made the occasion of one of the most remarkable demonstrations the world has witnessed in modern times. During the week beginning June 20, the English capital will be the scene of a series of Jubilee festivities in which all the civilized nations will be represented and which, especially to the English-speaking peoples, will be a season of widespread felicitations and rejoicings. Such a tribute of universal esteem has few parallels in history. This Empress-Queen, who has occupied the throne during the longest reign of modern times; whose rule has been marked by a continuous advancement of the Anglo-Saxon idea, the progress prosperity of her people and the unexampled extension of her colonies; and the dignity of whose personal character and conduct has lifted her to a very high plane among the monarchs of her time, possesses a universal love and admiration of her subjects everywhere and is universally respected by other nations as whose influence has ever been cast on the side of peace and justice.

Years ago, in 1887, when the Victorian half-century had been rounded, a jubilee was held in London in honor of the event and the British Isles and the colonies united in making the occasion a memorable one. Another decade has passed and the aged Queen, the oldest living monarch, and with the longest reign in British history, is once again to be the recipient of world-wide honors.

Months past, London has been preparing for the approaching Jubilee. Great scaffoldings have been erected at different points along the route of the procession, and speculators have invested large sums in anticipating a rich harvest from sightseers. The railway and steamship lines, and other transportation companies have made extensive arrangements for the great increase of travel which is expected from all parts of the United Kingdom and the continent. The hotels and boarding-houses have all been fixed at a high rate for the Jubilee, and far in excess of the usual rate. It is consequently expected that the population of London will be increased several millions of visitors, and the celebration will continue. The advance guard of the army of spectators is already in the city, and the programme of festivities is everywhere being discussed. On the morning of June 20, the anniversary of Queen Victoria's accession to the throne sixty years ago, a religious service will be held at Frogmore, Windsor, the site of the mausoleum erected to the memory of the Prince Consort, and the Queen's mother, the Duchess of Kent. On Monday, June 21, the Court will move to London and a banquet in honor of the royal guests will be given at Buckingham Palace, followed by a reception for the members of the Diplomatic Corps and the special envoys from abroad.

Although London has witnessed many a "royal progress" in its time, the jubilee procession in Victoria's honor on June 22 will eclipse all previous displays of the kind, and in point of numbers and in spectacular grandeur will recall the famous "triumphs" of imperial Rome. It will start from Buckingham Palace and move in a north-westerly direction, through Constitution Hill, past the Wellington statue, along Piccadilly, past Hyde Park and Green Park, thence to St. James street and Pall Mall, past the old St. James Palace through Pall Mall West on the other side of Regent street, Waterloo Place, and Pall Mall East and past the National Gallery. Then the route will lead along the Strand, past the Law Courts, Fleet street, Ludgate Circus, and Ludgate Hill to St. Paul's churchyard. At St. Paul's, the important religious ceremony of the day will be performed.

Leaving St. Paul's, the royal procession will continue eastward, to Cheapside, passing Bow Church with its famous bells, then toward the Mansion House (the seat of civic authority), down King William Street and on to London Bridge. Among the chief points which it will pass during its further progress are: St. Saviour's Church, Borough High Street, St. George's Church, Christ Church at the junction of Kennington Road and Westminster Bridge Road, Westminster Bridge, St. Thomas Hospital and the Houses of Parliament—the latter at the opposite side of the river. Then the procession will turn to the right and proceed along Whitehall, passing the famous palace of that name. After various other turns it will again reach St. James' Park and passing along the Mall, will reach Buckingham Palace, bringing the remarkable public display to a close. In the evening the entire city will be brilliantly illuminated, as a fitting close to the great pageant.

On Wednesday, June 23, a garden party will be held at Buckingham Palace, for which thousands of invitations have been issued. On Thursday the Court will move to Windsor, the occasion being marked by a fine military demonstration. On Friday there will be a second royal banquet, this time at Windsor, and the next day a great naval review will take place at Spithead, which the Queen will not attend, however.

Almost every nationality and government in the civilized world will be specially represented at the Jubilee.

The rulers of countries, both far and near, having appointed special envoys to convey gifts and felicitations to the aged Victoria. The Sultan of Turkey will be represented by his son, Mehmed-Selim Effendi, and other potentates by persons of high title and distinction. Innumerable gifts and tokens of esteem are going from every quarter of the globe, from persons in public and private life, from

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

J. J. M., Trenton, N. J. I would be glad to learn something regarding the Cabot Tower which it is proposed to erect at Bristol, England.

It is a structure now being erected by the citizens of Bristol to commemorate the four hundredth anniversary of John Cabot's discovery of the North American continent. It will be an ornate tower, on the top of Brandon Hill, and the foundation stone will be laid on the 24th inst. The exact dimensions are not stated.

Student, Cambridge, Mass. Do evolutionists believe that there will ever be a higher being than man, or that man is the end of all the ages of development?

Drummond, Fiske and others maintain that there will be no further development, but we are not sure that it is held by all evolutionists. Drummond's reasons for the belief as given in his latest work is that when man began to make tools, there was an end of physical development because development came by use and effort. When men learned how to employ steam and electricity there was less use for physical strength and consequently less probability of an increase of physical strength. So with the eye. Man has increased its powers by the telescope and microscope, so that any development of the powers of vision is not to be expected.

Reader, Cripple Creek, Colo. 1. Do worshippers of idols believe that there is power in the image itself, or do they believe in a living God, a Supreme Being, and use this image as a medium between them and the Supreme Being? 2. Which is the older, the Bible or the Koran?

1. In the broadest sense, idolatry is the paying of divine honor to any created object. It is therefore more than image-worship. Thus animals, trees, rivers, hills, and even stones are worshipped in the lowest form of idolatry known as fetichism, these creatures and things being represented by images through which the homage paid is supposed to be transmitted. A higher grade of idolatry is nature-worship, which gives homage to a mysterious unseen power, or to the sun, moon, stars, and forces of nature. Still other forms of idolatry are hero or ancestor-worship, and the vast and complex systems of heathenism found in Egypt, Babylonia, China, and other ancient countries, whose numerous deities represent all the degrees of idolatry already referred to. But while the idea or principle behind the image was worshipped rather than the image itself, it is equally true that since all idolatry tends to ignorance and confusion, the worshippers become oblivious to the existence of a Supreme Being or of any unseen power, and attributed to the visible image alone the qualities of deity, thus making image-worship the natural and seemingly inevitable outcome of all idolatrous systems. The conception of a Supreme Ruler over all is gradually obscured and sometimes almost obliterated. We see this demonstrated among the poor and uneducated of our own day in those countries where images are employed as a part of the paraphernalia of any religious system. 2. The Bible is the older. The Koran was not written until the seventh century A. D., and a considerable part of its contents gives evidence of having been adapted from the Jewish and Christian Scriptures.

Referring to "Earnest Inquirer's" letter on the subject of phrenology, A. R. Irving, Ia., writes:

Phrenology is a true science. The reason it is not admitted more readily is because first, it is not thoroughly understood by the majority of the people, and secondly, because a great many do not want to believe that others can read their characters. Phrenology determines the size of the mental organs by the distance from the spinal axis, which is located half way on a straight line between the two openings of the ears to the surface of the head. And the size of the organs character is determined by the distance from the center of the head to the organ. A strong firmness will be manifested in any one of the qualities, age and weight of a person will be determined. In making a correct diagnosis of characters, that is the true science of phrenology in a nutshell.

Miss Edna M. C. L. New Boston, N. H. When and where did the Roman Catholic Church originate?

Catholic historians claim that the Church's history began with the life of Christ on earth. Such was, in reality, the origin of the Christian Church, but not of the Catholic Church by any means. There was no such church as the Roman Catholic in existence until the 8th century, when the Episcopal Church was gradually converted into a papal Church. The latter had meanwhile spread all through the Roman world and by the conversion of the Emperor Constantine, had become the ruling Church of the empire. The temporal power of the Church was established at the close of the 8th century, and the beginning of the Church, as it is now known, is generally regarded by historians as dating from that period.

Rev. C. C. Bateman, U. S. Army Chaplain at the military post at Fort Sherman, Idaho, writes us that generous responses have been received to his appeal for back numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. New issues will still be acceptable.

Reader, San Saba, Tex. 1. How is any one to be comforted when their trouble is so great they cannot pray? 2. Is it right to pray for means to carry out a plan that would be a public benefit?

1. God may give comfort if one of his children cannot pray. If it is that he will not pray, God would probably leave him comfortless. Trouble sometimes produces a resentment against God, a tendency to blame him for per-put a sum of money in your hands, to be used in his absence, in his interests, how would you use it? You would not spend any of it in discharging obligations of your own, nor in relieving yourself of duties that you would perform if he had not given you the money. If you heard of a family in distress, and you went to them and in Christ's name gave them help, you would be justified, in our opinion, in charging to the tenth not only the money you give them but your own expenses such as car-fare, etc. It is a service for Christ and you spend his money in his way.

E. I. B., Russell Springs, Kans. 1. How did the Apostles cast lots as mentioned Acts 1: 23-26? 2. Was the election of Matthias by that means a valid one?

1. We do not know, nor is it important. One method in vogue was to put both names into an urn and shake it, the one coming out first being the one chosen. Sometimes pebbles were used in a similar way. 2. There seems to have been no need of an appointment. The fact of there being twelve tribes may have given the Apostles the idea of it being necessary to have twelve Apostles. As it proved, the real Apostle who was to make the number complete was Paul.

Subscriber, Dindonald, Ont. I have been told that a gentleman who has been in business in Bombay has stated that there has not been a single death from famine in India this year. Does not that disprove your statements?

Not at all. It simply proves that if the gentleman from Bombay is honest in making the statement, he is deplorably ignorant of the facts, and is very rash in making a statement on insufficient knowledge. Unhappily, it is only too true that there have been thousands of deaths from starvation. The Government returns give no idea of the number, because

A FAMILY OF TEHUELCHES IN PATAGONIA.

The people of the South-eastern regions of South America have long been recognized as specimens of the lowest type of humanity. Charles Darwin insisted that it was impossible to civilize them, but the great scientist lived to see and frankly acknowledge his error. The spirit of the saintly Allen Gardiner, who lost his life in the attempt to give them the Gospel, has inspired noble Christian men and women to carry on his work, and many natives, such as those depicted in the photograph, are now to be found attending the services of the mission decently clothed and living Christian lives.

mitting the trouble to come, and then there is a time of darkness. In endeavoring to comfort such a person the surest way is to pray with him and to try to strengthen his faith, so that he shall be submissive and convinced that in spite of his sorrow, God loves him and has not willingly afflicted him. 2. It is right to pray for means in such a case, but the prayer should be in a spirit of trust so that there shall be no impatience if the answer is not granted. We are not always right about what will be a public benefit. God may see that the project will not be beneficial in the end. It is always safe to trust his wisdom.

"One Desirous of Doing Right," New York. Having resolved to give a tenth of my income to the Lord, and I right in counting into the tenth the money I give to unfortunate relatives and friends, or must the whole of the tenth be given to church work?

Not necessarily to church work. Your own conscience must be your guide, and it is not possible to give rules applicable to all persons. In the case you mention of unfortunate relatives and friends, you would probably give to them if you were not a Christian. The tenth should be disposed of in ways in which you would not spend money if you were not a Christian. In a word you give it for Christ's sake and because you love him. If you consecrate it to him, it is his. How would you use his money? If an employer

Here is a suggestion which may be of to some of those prominent in Sunday work, and who are interested in the now about to close.

Toronto has at last lost its quiet Sunday the present we have had no Sunday cars, previous occasions they took the votes of ple on it and lost; and now, a third time, taken a vote, and this time they have pr cessful, owing to the fact that they gave all young men twenty-one years of age, gained their object to desecrate the Sabbath.

A. L. H., Baraboo, Wis. 1. Is it right for people to act upon pieces at an opera raise money for church funds, giving name to them such as "Erminie," "Maid's Convention?" If it is not Christian people to attend these troupes, what is the difference between the home talent? 2. Does it where in the New Testament about the tenth to the Lord?

The whole subject of church entertainments very exhaustively discussed in a little booklet issued by A. W. Hall, publisher, New York, which you should procure. 2. Mr. R. T. Allison, Superintendent of Lottsville Woolen Mills Union S. S., after forwarding a contribution to the Famine Fund, writes:

There is one very worthy incident connected with this collection. Of the total of $2,300 were given by Miss B., a member of our Bible classes. She is a weaver in our mill; her contribution represents about one week's toil—after paying her board, and I am tempted to ask the question—how many of the wealth of our land have done as much—given all their income for one week after deducting their board?

Mrs. E. M. Williamson, Huntsdale, Ill. A question arose in our Sunday School whether Paul the Apostle was a statesman. I think I have read somewhere that was. Am I not right?

The passage you probably had in mind is 1 Cor. 10: 10, wherein Paul, speaking of himself, writes: "his bodily presence is weak, his speech contemptible." We do not, however, the language warrants the conclusion that he stammered, but was rather impeded by a desire to belittle his own oratorical powers, or to refer to them modestly.

starvation induces disease, and when the death of a famine-stricken native is recorded it is generally registered as being caused by the disease which finally ended his sufferings and not from starvation which caused the disease. The gentleman from Bombay probably associated almost exclusively with white people, and if he had said that no white person had died of famine he would have been correct. Nor have there been many, if any, deaths of natives in Bombay from famine, though there have been many not far from the city. We prefer to give credence to the testimony of missionaries who have seen the corpses and to disinterested persons who have gone through the famine belt, and who report an appalling number of deaths. "THE MOTHER OF BELLEVILLE."

Mlle. Broen's Mission Work Among the Slums of Paris—A Brave, Heroic, Consecrated Christian Life and its Results.

BELLEVILLE! What fearful reminiscences this name invokes, what souvenirs of murder and rapine. The massacre and destruction! Belleville, the workingmen's quarter of Paris, was the principal stronghold of the Commune of 1871, the spot where the fiery revolutionists made their last stand when the troops of Marshal Mac Mahon broke into the capital. The fighting was most desperate in the Belleville quarter, and even children taking part in the ground had to be conquered inch by inch. Hot water, burning oil, explosives were freely used by the rebels, and when the Versailles troops occupied the summit, the Buttes Mont, they could look back on a trail of burning dwellings and mutilated men. Such were the passions aroused by fratricidal strife that no quarter was given even after the actual fighting ceased, men and women alike were ness, of the love of the Saviour, of the joys of heaven.

This episode was the commencement of Mademoiselle Josephine de Broen's great life work amid the slums of Paris, the full importance of which the writer was able to gauge a day or two ago upon visiting her institutions on behalf of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mlle. de Broen is a Hollander by birth, but she went to England at a comparatively early age and became active in Church work there. It was at the instance of Mrs. Christine Alsopp, an English Quakeress, that she decided to come to Paris early in 1871 in order to help lessen the distress of the poorer population, and naturally enough her mission took her to the very heart of the stricken districts. She has remained here ever since, and to-day two large buildings devoted to the alleviation of sufferings, the education of the young, and the spread of God's Word testify to her energy, her philanthropy, and her active Christianity.

But more durable monuments than even these establishments are the love and respect of a large population including the most turbulent elements in French society, sons and daughters of the "martyrs" of '71, in whose eyes the present institutions and even the present form of government are a scourge. Among the most unreconcilable of these people even she is known as the "Mother of Belleville." Louise Michel, least the tribute of a respectful hearing to the kind Christian woman who had so often materially assisted their mothers, wives and daughters in moments of want and suffering. What better testimony can be offered of Mlle. de Broen's power for good among these very outcasts of the human race?

When I arrived at the iron building at No. 32 Rue Boiivar, which also serves as a chapel, a school and a meeting room, I found it occupied by half a hundred old women ranging between sixty and ninety years, busily engaged knitting, stitching and hemming old garments and at various other kinds of needlework. Yes, gentle reader, some of these unfortunate creatures were bordering on ninety years, and but for the small sum they receive from the mission for this merely nominal labor—they are not expected to accomplish much—there would be nothing between them and actual starvation. It is true the government is supposed to provide homes for the aged poor, but such are the delays of French red tapism that, to quote an old saying, "while the grass grows the mare starves." Only the other day the Officers of the Poor reached the hovel of an aged pauper who weeks before had applied for relief, to find the occupant a corpse. The poor thing had died of absolute want.

The Mission does not concern itself about an applicant's creed. Penury is a sure passport through its doors. Inside kind words of hope and consolation accompany the material help, and often the hearts of the unfortunates are touched

VETERANS OF THE BELLEVILLE QUARTER.

Mlle. de Broen is now a stately woman in the neighborhood of the fifties. She reminds one somewhat of earlier portraits of Queen Victoria excepting that her features are more regular and, I may justly add, more aristocratic, which indeed is not surprising for the lady is of noble birth. Advancing years and the hard struggles and not infrequent disappointments incidental to her work have not lessened her ardor, as I realized while accompanying her to the historic spot in the Pere La Chaise Cemetery, where she first conceived her idea of a Belleville Mission. On the way thither she busied herself distributing tracts and dodgers advertising a free lecture at the Iron room. She would drop these papers into the market baskets of passing housewives or thrust them into the horny hands of street laborers. For her it was the Lord's work, and so there was no question of diffidence or false pride. Her home and her orphanage, for she conducts an orphanage in addition to her other work is at No. 3 Rue Clavel, a few blocks away from the Iron room, and if she is not at one or the other of these places it is because she has started out with her secretary, Miss Balthasar, to investigate some case of distress in the slums of the quarter. She has expended her own fortune in the good work and looks forward with confidence to the support of sympathetic friends in both hemispheres. It would require more space than is here available to describe in detail her labors among the poor of the White-chapel of Paris. What with Bible meetings, Sunday School classes for young and old, night instruction for boys and girls, sewing bees, Gospel lessons, etc., the benches of the Iron room are

THE SEWING CLASS OF POOR FRENCH-WOMEN AT THE BELLEVILLE MISSION, PARIS.

"but," said the woman with the earnest face, "I have lost all!" "Indeed," replied the lady, "you have not lost all; you have not lost the love of your Heavenly Father." The words seemed to soothe the poor, suffering creature. A ray of light, a beam of peace, seemed to brighten the tearful eyes. The effect of her words gave the speaker an inspiration: she turned to the broken-hearted mourners around, and, despite her imperfect command of their language, soon won their attention by her earnest pleadings and Christian exhortations—this to people who had never till then heard of God's goodness, of the love of the Saviour, of the joys of heaven. This episode was the commencement of Mademoiselle Josephine de Broen's great life work amid the slums of Paris, the full importance of which the writer was able to gauge a day or two ago upon visiting her institutions on behalf of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mlle. de Broen is a Hollander by birth, but she went to England at a comparatively early age and became active in Church work there. It was at the instance of Mrs. Christine Alsopp, an English Quakeress, that she decided to come to Paris early in 1871 in order to help lessen the distress of the poorer population, and naturally enough her mission took her to the very heart of the stricken districts. She has remained here ever since, and to-day two large buildings devoted to the alleviation of sufferings, the education of the young, and the spread of God's Word testify to her energy, her philanthropy, and her active Christianity. But more durable monuments than even these establishments are the love and respect of a large population including the most turbulent elements in French society, sons and daughters of the "martyrs" of '71, in whose eyes the present institutions and even the present form of government are a scourge. Among the most unreconcilable of these people even she is known as the "Mother of Belleville." Louise Michel, least the tribute of a respectful hearing to the kind Christian woman who had so often materially assisted their mothers, wives and daughters in moments of want and suffering. What better testimony can be offered of Mlle. de Broen's power for good among these very outcasts of the human race? When I arrived at the iron building at No. 32 Rue Boiivar, which also serves as a chapel, a school and a meeting room, I found it occupied by half a hundred old women ranging between sixty and ninety years, busily engaged knitting, stitching and hemming old garments and at various other kinds of needlework. Yes, gentle reader, some of these unfortunate creatures were bordering on ninety years, and but for the small sum they receive from the mission for this merely nominal labor—they are not expected to accomplish much—there would be nothing between them and actual starvation. It is true the government is supposed to provide homes for the aged poor, but such are the delays of French red tapism that, to quote an old saying, "while the grass grows the mare starves." Only the other day the Officers of the Poor reached the hovel of an aged pauper who weeks before had applied for relief, to find the occupant a corpse. The poor thing had died of absolute want. The Mission does not concern itself about an applicant's creed. Penury is a sure passport through its doors. Inside kind words of hope and consolation accompany the material help, and often the hearts of the unfortunates are touched pretty well occupied all the time. It is a noteworthy fact that several of the American art students in the Latin quarter members of the Christian Endeavor Society take the long trip over to Belleville twice a week in order to help teach English to the free scholars of the mission. Finally, let me say that in the winter months free soup is distributed daily among the worthy poor of the quarter. Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD already know something of the work of Mlle. de Broen, and to such this statement of its continuous progress will be specially gratifying.

CONTRARY WINDS.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Matt. 14: 24. The wind was contrary.

I well know by experience on Lake Galilee, one hour all may be calm and the next hour the winds and waves will be so boisterous that you are in doubt as to whether you will land on the shore or on the bottom of the deep. The disciples in the text were caught in such a stress of weather and the sails bent and the ship plunged for "the wind was contrary." There is in one of the European straits a place, where, whichever way you sail, the winds are opposing. There are people who all their life seem sailing in the teeth of the wind. All things seem against them. It may be said of their condition as of that of the disciples in my text: "the wind was contrary."

A great multitude of people are under seeming disadvantage, and I will to-day, in the swarthiest Anglo-Saxon that I can manage, treat their cases; not as a nurse counts out eight or ten drops of a prescription, and stirs them in a half-glass of water, but as when a man has by a mistake taken a large amount of strychnine, or Paris green, or belladonna, and the patient is walked rapidly round the room, and shaken up, until he gets wide awake. Many of you have taken a large draught of the poison of discouragement, and I come out by the order of the Divine Physician to rouse you out of that lethargy.

First, many people are under the disadvantage of an unfortunate name given them by parents who thought they were doing a good thing. It is outrageous to afflict children with an undesirable name because it happened to be possessed by a parent or a rich uncle from whom favors are expected, or some prominent man of the day who may end his life in disgrace.

Impose not upon that babe a name suggestive of flippancy or meanness. There is no excuse for such assault and battery on the cradle when our language is opulent with names musical and suggestive in meaning, such as John, meaning "the gracious gift of God;" or Henry, meaning "the chief of a household;" or Alfred, meaning "good counselor;" or Joshua, meaning "God, our salvation;" or Ambrose, meaning "immortal;" or Andrew, meaning "manly;" or Esther, meaning "star;" or Abigail, meaning "my father's joy;" or Anna, meaning "grace;" or Victoria, meaning "victory;" or Rosalie, meaning "beautiful as a rose;" or Margaret, meaning "a pearl;" or Ida, meaning "godlike;" or Clara, meaning "illustrious;" or Amelia, meaning "busy;" or Bertha, meaning "beautiful," and hundreds of other names just as good, that are a help rather than a hindrance.

But sometimes the great hindrance in life is not in the given name, but in the family name. While legislatures are willing to lift such incubus, there are families that keep a name which mortgages all the generations with a great disadvantage. You say: "I wonder if he is any relation to so-and-so," mentioning some family celebrated for crime. The city directory has hundreds of names the mere pronunciation of which has been a life-long obstacle. We live in America, and I suppose it is so in all countries, names which ought to be abolished and can be, and will be abolished for the reason that they are a label and a slander. But if for any reason you are submerged either by a given name or by a family name that you must bear, God will help you to overcome the outrage by a life consecrated to the good and useful. You may erase the curse from the name. If it once stood for meanness, you can make it stand for generosity. If once it stood for pride, you can make it stand for humility. If it once stood for fraud, you can make it stand for honesty. If once it stood for wickedness, you can make it stand for purity. There have been multitudes of instances where men and women have magnificently conquered the disasters of the name inflicted upon them.

Again, many people labor under the misfortune of incomplete physical equipment. We are by our Creator so economically built that we cannot afford the obliteration of any physical faculty. We want our two eyes, our two ears, our two hands, our two feet, our eight fingers and two thumbs. Yet what multitudes of people have but one eye, or but one foot! The ordinary casualties of life have been quadrupled, quintupled, sextupled, aye, centupled, in our time by the Civil War, and at the North and South a great multitude are fighting the battle of life with half, or less than half, the needed physical armaments. I do not wonder at the pathos of a soldier during the war, who, when told that he must have his hand amputated, said: "Doctor, can't you save it?" and when told that it was impossible, said, with tears rolling down his cheeks: "Well, then, good-bye, old hand; I hate to part with you. You have done me a good service for many years, but it seems you must go. Good-bye."

The way the battle of Crecy was decided against the French was by the Welshmen killing the French horses, and that brought their riders to the ground. And when you cripple this body, which is merely the animal on which the soul rides, you may sometimes defeat the soul.

Yet how many suffer from this physical taking off! Good cheer, my brother! God will make it up to you somehow. The grace, the sympathy of God, will be more to you than anything you have lost. If God allows part of your resources to be cut off in one place, he will add it on somewhere else. As Augustus, the emperor, took off a day from February, making it the shortest month in the year, and added it to August, the month named after himself, so advantages taken from one part of your nature will be added on to another. But it is amazing how much of the world's work has been done by men of subtracted physical organization. S. S. Preston, the great orator of the Southwest, went limping all his life, but there was no foot put down upon any platform of his day that resounded so far as his club foot. Beethoven was so deaf that he could not hear the crash of the orchestra rendering his oratorios. Thomas Carlyle, the dyspeptic martyr, was given the commission to drive cant out of the world's literature. The Rev. Thomas Stockton, of Philadelphia, with one lung raised his audience nearer heaven than most ministers can raise them with two lungs. In the banks, the insurance companies, the commercial establishments, the reformatory associations, the churches, there are tens of thousands of men and women to-day doubled up with rheumatism, or subject to the neuralgias, or with only fragments of limbs, the rest of which they left at Chattanooga, or South Mountain, or the Wilderness, and they are worth more to the world, and more to the Church, and more to God than those of us who have never so much as had a finger-joint stilted by a felon.

The skilled horsemen stood around Bucephalus, unable to mount or manage him, so wild was the steed. But Alexander noticed that the sight of his own shadow seemed to disturb the horse. So Alexander clutched him by the bridle, and turned his head away from the shadow, and toward the sun, and the horse's agitation was gone, and Alexander mounted him and rode off, to the astonishment of all who stood by. And what you people need is to have your sight turned away from the shadows of your earthly lot over which you have so long pondered, and your head turned toward the sun—the glorious sun of Gospel consolation, and Christian hope, and spiritual triumph.

And then remember that all physical disadvantages will after awhile vanish. Let those who have been rheumatized out of a foot, or cataracted out of an eye, or by the perpetual roar of our cities thundered out of an ear, look forward to the day when this old tenement-house of flesh will come down and a better one shall be builded. Just what it means by corruption putting on incorruption we do not know, save that it will be glory ineffable; no limping in heaven, no straining of the eyesight to see things a little way off; no putting of the hand behind the ear to double the capacity of the tympanum; but faculties perfect, all the keys of the instrument attuned for the sweep of the fingers of ecstasy. But until that day of resurrection comes, let us bear each other's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

Another form of disadvantage under which many labor is lack of early education. There will be no excuse for ignorance in the next generation. Free schools and illimitable opportunity of education will make ignorance a crime. I believe in compulsory education, and those parents who neglect to put their children under educational advantages have but one right left, and that is the penitentiary. But there are multitudes of men and women in mid-life who have had no opportunity. Free schools had not yet been established, and vast multitudes had little or no school at all. They feel it when as Christian men they come to speak or pray in religious assemblies or public occasions, patriotic, or political, or educational. They are silent because they do not feel competent.

Now, suppose a man finds himself in mid-life without education, what is he to do? Do the best he can. The most effective layman in a former pastoral charge that I ever heard speak on religious themes could, within five minutes of exhortation, break all the laws of English grammar, and if he left any law unfractured he would complete the work of lingual devastation in the prayer with which he followed it. But I would rather have him pray for me, if I were sick or in trouble, than any Christian man I know of, and in that church all the people preferred him in exhortation and prayer to all others. Why? Because he was so thoroughly pious and had such power with God he was irresistible; and as he went on in his prayer sinners repented and saints shouted for joy, and the bereaved seemed to get back their dead in celestial companionship.

Not a word have I to say against accuracy of speech, or fine elocution, or high mental culture. Get all these you can. But I do say to those who were brought up in the day of poor school-houses and ignorant schoolmasters, and no opportunity: You may have so much of good in your soul and so much of heaven in your everyday life that you will be mightier for good than any who went through the curriculum of Harvard, or Yale, or Oxford, yet never graduated in the school of Christ.

But what other multitudes there are under other disadvantages! Here is a Christian woman whose husband thinks religion a sham, and while the wife prays the children one way the husband swears them another. Or here is a Christian man who is trying to do his best for God and the Church, and his wife holds him back and says on the way home from prayer-meeting, where he gave testimony for Christ: "What a fool you made of yourself! I hope hereafter you will keep still!" And when he would be benevolent and give fifty dollars, she criticizes him for not giving fifty cents. What a withering curse such a woman must be to a good man!

Then there are others under the great disadvantage of poverty. Who ought to get things cheapest? You say those who have little means. But they pay more. You buy coal by the ton, they buy it by the bucket. You buy flour by the barrel, they buy it by the pound. You get apparel cheap, because you pay cash. They pay dear because they have to get trusted. And the Bible was right when it said: "the destruction of the poor is their poverty." Then there are those who made a mistake in early life, and that overtook all their days. "Do you not know that that man was once in prison?" interrupted. Or, "Do you know that that man once attempted suicide?" Or, "Do you know that that man once absconded?" Or, "Do you know that that man was discharged for dishonesty?" There was only one wrong deed man's life, and that one act had subsequent half century of his existence.

Others have unfortunate predilection of some mental faculty, and their throws them into wild enterprises. Trepidation makes them decline opportunity, or there is a vein of melancholy in their disposition that defeats them. They have an endowment of over-activity that causes the impression of insubstantiality.

Others have a mighty obstacle in personal appearance, for which they are not responsible. They forget the fashioned their features, and the plexion, and their stature, the size of nose, and mouth, and hands, and feet, gave them their gait and their appearance; and they forget that the world's best work and the best work has been done by hump-backed; and that Paul the Apostle has been hump-backed, and his weakness by ophthalmia, while the finest in appearance have passed time before flattering looking-glasses in studying killing attitudes, and playing the richness of wardrobe one ribbon, or vest, or sack, or button, or shoe-string of which they had brains to earn for themselves.

Others had wrong proclivities in start. They were born wrong, sticks to one even after he is born. They have a natural crankiness, two hundred and seventy-five years came over with their great grandfather from Scotland, or Wales, or France, was born on the banks of the Thames, the Clyde, or the Tiber, or the Rhine, has survived all the plagues and epidemics of many generations, and is living on the banks of the Potomac, or the Hudson, or the Androscoggin, or the Amazon, or the La Plata. And when he tries to stop this evil ancestral plagues he is like a man on a rock in the middle of Niagara holding on with a grip from the swift currents are trying to sweep into the abyss beyond.

In the way of practical relief for all advantages and all woes, the only thing that is worth listening to on this subject is the voice of Christianity, which is the voice of Almighty God. Whether mentioned the particular disadvantage under which you labor or not, I declare, in the name of my God, that is a way out and a way up for all.

Take good courage from that land of whose promises are for those in predicament. There are better things for you, either on earth or in heaven, than my hand under your chin, and my face into the light of the coming day. Have God on your side, and take for reserve troops all the angels of heaven, the smallest company of twenty thousand chariots, and the brigade one hundred and forty-four thousand, the lightnings of heaven the sword.

An ancient warrior saw an over-coming host come down upon his army of armed men, and mounting horse he threw a handful of dust into the air, crying, "Let their faces be covered with confusion!" And armies heard his voice, and history it seemed as though the dust they threw the air had become so many angels of supernatural deliverance, and they overcame the mighty, and the host fell back, and the small army marched on. Have faith in God, though all the allied forces of discomfitment seem to come against you in array, and their laugh of derision and contempt resounds through all the valleys and mountains, you might by faith and importunate prayer, pick up the dust of the very dust of your humiliation, throw it into the air, and it shall become angels of victory over all the armies of earth and hell. The voices of your saries, human and satanic, shall be covered with confusion, while you are not only conqueror, but more than conqueror through that grace which often made the fallen helmet of the thrown antagonist the footstool of Christian victory.

undoubted Queen of this realm. Will ye all swear to do her homage?" Each time he said it there were shouts of "Long live Queen Victoria!" and the sounding of trumpets and the waving of banners, which made the poor little queen turn first very red and then very pale. Most of the ladies cried, and I felt I should not forget it as long as I lived. The Queen recovered herself after this, and went through all the rest as if she had often been crowned before, but seemed much impressed by the service, and a most beautiful one it is.
The Archbishop placed the crown of England on her head, and at the same moment the peers and peeresses simultaneously put on their coronets, the bishops their mitres, the months Victoria's junior. Wisely and carefully educated, and with a strong sense of religious duty and responsibility, he had also a high appreciation of the value of royal prerogatives and during his whole career, was a staunch supporter of the rights of the throne. The story of the married lives of Victoria and Albert reads like an idyll. Although occupying exalted positions, their tastes were really simple and the children who blessed the union were reared in a plain, wholesome, Christian way, as might become the sons and daughters of private gentlemen. In which he was the first to do homage, followed by all the lords spiritual (the other bishops) and the lords temporal, in regular order, according to rank. Each removed his coronet, sional bright glimpses of the home life of the royal parents and children.

It is not necessary to here review in detail, the long and picturesque reign of Victoria; the leading facts of that period every reader of history knows. The first war cloud that darkened the horizon was the Afghan rising of 1841-42. Always an advocate of peace, where it could be secured honorably, the Queen at times gave evidence of possessing much martial spirit, although none mourned more deeply were matured and perfected. It was opened May 1, 1851, the building containing 25,000 people, while fully 700,000 stood outside, and its success has always been regarded by Her Majesty as one of the crowning triumphs of her long reign.

The Crimean War and the great Indian mutiny next swept across the horizon, leaving death, devastation and suffering in their wake. Then came quieter years, in which the home life, its joys and sorrows, were again predominant. The first break in the family circle was occasioned by the wedding, in 1858, of the eldest daughter, to Frederick of Germany.
A greater and far sadder breach was made when on Dec. 14, 1861, the Prince Consort passed away, after a comparatively brief illness, of gastric fever. Victoria's great love for her husband has found expression in many touching ways, and the Prince's memory is preserved by a number of beautiful statues, which his royal widow has caused to be erected in different parts of the empire. Although other afflictions have visited the palace, none has exercised such a marked influence on her life. In her deep bereavement, the strength of her Christian character became more and more apparent, endearing her to the entire nation.
On January 1, 1876, Queen Victoria was proclaimed Empress of India at Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, and Delhi, as the successor of the old Mogul rulers. She saw her kingdom extending on every hand —in Asia, Egypt, Africa, and in the islands of the seas. Her children's children began to crowd around her and, as old age approached, the love of her people became, if possible, more pronounced and spontaneous. Her progeny has been a numerous one. She has seventy living descendants—namely: sons and daughters living, 7; grandchildren, 33; great-grandchildren, 30.
In the coming Jubilee procession, four generations of the royal family in the direct line are to be represented—the Queen, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of York, and Prince Edward of York. Their ages will be: The Queen, 78; the Prince of Wales, 55; the Duke of York, 32; Prince Edward of York,
3. There are nearly 160 cousins and descendants of cousins of her Majesty, and if they are counted with the Queen's own children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, the number of the royal family is increased to not less than 230. Through her children and grandchildren, she is represented in almost all of the reigning families of Europe. Her influence has been on the side of righteousness and humanity, and she has aimed to make her empire a potent civilizing and Christianizing power. Her reign has been the grandest for missionary enterprise and Gospel triumphs the world has ever known.

THE MORMONS OF TO-DAY

BY
JOHN:
EATON:

LAST WORDS ON MORMONISM.

General Eaton Replies Frankly to His Critics—The Mormon Faith a National Evil—Directed by Astute Leaders for Selfish Ends.

GARFIELD BEACH, SALT LAKE, UTAH.

N the remarkably able and interesting letter published below, Gen. Eaton makes final reply to those critics—Mormons and their sympathizers—who have found fault with the statements of fact and the opinions expressed in his previous contributions to these columns on the Mormon question. With this publication, the discussion may be regarded as closed.

WASHINGTON, May 15.

One critic of these articles would prove the loyalty of Brigham Young by calling to mind that he furnished a volunteer battalion to the government in the Mexican War. Does the critic know that Brigham received twenty thousand dollars in advance for this patriotic demonstration? and that this battalion was organized as a friendly act; that the organization of this battalion was in a certain sense an aid to the Mormon emigration? The Mormons were to be taken as volunteers for twelve months only and marched to California, duly paid, and when discharged, allowed to retain as their private property the guns and accoutrements to be furnished them at the post, and that each company was allowed four women as laundresses, and that, as certified by General Cook, the usual regulations were relaxed in their favor. The entire history of this volunteer battalion in no way relieves the disloyal acts which followed on the part of Brigham and his coadjutors. Space does not permit dwelling on the details of the threats against the assumption of United States authority; the resistance to United States officers; the effort to organize the State of Deseret, which should be under their own control; the opposition to the first military force of the United States sent out; its annoyances by Brigham's militia; the capture of its teams and supplies, which finally compelled it to endure the perils of a winter at Ft. Bridger. Has our critic forgotten the scene when Brigham closing a harangue against Stephen H. Harding, who was sent out as Governor, in 1863, he asked his excited audience, "Do you acknowledge this man Harding as your Governor?" Voices all through the audience responded, "No, yet we are your Governor." "Yes," he added, "I am your Governor; and I will let him know that I am Governor; and if he attempts to interfere in my affairs, we will fight him!" Evidences of Mormon disloyalty revealed in public documents are too numerous to be quoted.

Non-Mormons, without exception, refuse to believe that the "Book of Mormon" is divinely inspired as claimed by Joseph Smith and his followers. The question of how far Smith and his followers are indebted to the Spaulding Manuscript is uncertain. One Spaulding Manuscript is in the possession of Oberlin College. The "Book of Mormon" bears resemblance to this, but is not a copy of it. Professor Whitatt, of the Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville, Ky., written a book, claiming that Sidney H. Reed was the author of the Mormon Bible, and the story is the same as preached by him.

Among our critics there is one who tries to show how Joseph Smith is a prophet foretold in the Scriptures, and how the "Book of Mormon" fulfils the prophetic words of the Old and New Testaments. It is claimed that there are in the Scriptures over a hundred references to the latter-day work and the "Book of Mormon." For instance, the "Book of Mormon" is "the book that is sealed," Isaiah 29:11. It is "the stick of Ephraim," mentioned Ezekiel 37:16. It is "the truth that shall spring out of the earth," Ps. 85:71. To mention these passages is enough to indicate the absurdity of the Mormon claim. In general terms, our critics affirm that the Mormon priesthood draw all their doctrines from the Bible, that they preach nothing incompatible with its truths; but none of these letters point out to me that portion of the Bible which warrants Brigham Young's doctrine of blood atonement. What is this doctrine? Here are Brigham Young's words: "There are sins that men commit for which they cannot receive forgiveness in this world, or in that which is to come, and if they had their eyes opened to their true condition they would be perfectly willing to have their blood spilt to the ground that the smoke thereof might ascend to heaven as an offering for their sins, and the smoking incense would atone for their sins; whereas, if such is not the case, they will stick to them and remain upon them in the spirit world. I know that when you hear my brethren tell about cutting people off from the earth, that you consider it a strong doctrine, but it is to save them, not to destroy them.  There are sins that can be atoned for by an offering upon an altar, as in ancient days; and there are sins that the blood of a lamb, or a calf, or of turtle doves cannot remit, but they must be atoned for by the blood of the man." Sunday, March 27th, 1863, Brigham declared, "Now, you Gladiators, keep your tongues still lest sudden destruction come upon you. I say rather than that the apostate should flourish here, I will smother my bonnie knife and conquer or die." "My critics nudge me to be true to the record.

This has been my special effort. If I have not stated exactly the truth, I should be greatly pleased to have it pointed out. One elder complains that the quotation from him misrepresents him, and again he declares to a caller that my statements are as far from right as hell is from heaven."

There is from many correspondents great exaltation of Joseph Smith and Brigham Young. The effort to treat these men as saints, or as comparing favorably with the apostles of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, will hardly succeed with the body of intelligent and reasonable people of our day.

The recent effort to have the State of Utah put the statue of Brigham Young in the National Hall of Statuary at Washington, points to the feelings cherished among the Mormons; but should the statue be placed there, can the body of Americans, as they compare it with that of Washington, fail to look at it with anything less than abhorrence? How many tens of thousands at the sight of his statue in the fair grounds at Chicago called to mind his evil example!

Mormons emphasize the idea of the temple. What goes on within it gentiles are not permitted to know. Here the secret marriages are performed. Here in secret the plans of the priesthood are prepared and issued for the implicit direction of confiding followers. Could all of these secrets be made known to the public, much of the deception now practiced would be prevented. It will be remembered that a temple was commenced at Kirtland, that the one at Nauvoo was becoming magnificent before destroyed; there are three in Utah, the principal one being located in Salt Lake City, in which the great system centres. Much has been made of all the steps in the erection of the one at Salt Lake City. Have the honest-minded Mormons forgotten Brigham Young's language uttered from the pulpit and literally reported with regard to this edifice? "When the temple is completed," he declared, "that very day, yes, that very hour, Christ with his holy angels and the prophets and apostles and Joseph and Hiram" (meaning the saints), "and all the saints who have died in the faith and all who have obeyed revealed authority will come to set up his kingdom on earth." But alas for this false prophet and his prophecy! He lies mouldering like others in the dust, the temple is completed, and nothing is seen of the coming of our Lord and his holy angels which he foretold.

Both Brighamites and Josephites make serious objection to my characterization of the early life of Joseph Smith, junior, or their first prophet. I do not claim to speak from personal knowledge, but to quote from those who had personal knowledge, and to state the proof sheets, and had thus personal knowledge of much of which he testified. Hays says "Joe Smith, as he was universally named, the Smith family were popularly regarded as illiterate, whiskey-drinking, shiftless, irreligious race of people—the first named being mously voted the laziest and most wretched of the generation." He continues, "Fifty years of twelve to twenty years he is remembered as a dull, idle, flaxen-haired, varicating boy, noted only for his indolent vagabondish character and his habits of generation and untruthfulness. His was received with the least confidence by those who knew him best. He could utter no palpable exaggeration of marvelous ability with the utmost apparent gravity. He thus evidenced the rapid development of thinking, plotting, evil-brewing mental position, largely given to the invention of cunning schemes of mischief and deception and false and mysterious pretension. He called him the "genius" of the age. As he advanced in ability to read, the words of Stephen Burrows and Captain Kidd like presented the highest charms for expanding mental perceptions. When he became a spiritual or religious turn of mind he became familiar with select texts of scripture, which he discussed with great authority in the presence of his superstitious followers. Prophecies and revelations were his special forte, and his deductions and conclusions were often disgustingly blasphemous according to the common apprehensions of Christian people. Mr. Pomeroy remained in his attendance at protracted revival meetings and states that he at one time joined a Unitarian Methodist Church, and never the saving point of conversion, and he declares that all the churches were or would be a foundation and the Bible a failure. Mr. Pomeroy affirms that the "Smith family all were" "unqualified atheists."

It is a notable fact that all who have investigated Mormonism have found a wide difference between the character of the leaders and the character of the great body of the people. The leaders are designing; the people are simple. A multitude of witnesses have testified that neither piety nor virtue is necessary to Mormonism; but there is great agreement in the testimonies pointing to the thrift and good citizenship found among their followers. The leaders know enough of human nature to understand there must be a certain amount of common virtues in the body of the people, among any large body of people, to make even their selfish leaders respectable.

The more virtuous in the relations with each other that the Mormon people can be, and yet be true to the demands of the priests receiving the creed prescribed, the tenth of their substance, and their regard of ordinances tallies less they will shock the evangelists, the more acceptable they will be to the easygoing, worldly people with whom they associate, and the gratification may come in many ways to their official hierarchy.

It should be kept in mind that Mormonism is not merely an evil in the individual heart, but it is an organized system directed by astute leaders for their selfish ends. Assuming to be a religion but intrinsically itself in the elements of human nature, which doctrines first destroys the idea of the God-head, and leaves room for the Christian idea of Godhood or womanhood. To get something of the habit of thought action contributed by Christianity remain in spite of evil teachings in life and in social and civil relations to be evil results; but when this habit, from the influence of Christianity, what evils may not be expected? Says one of this false religion, in the language of Ezekiel, "Her priests have violated, and have profaned my holy things; they have put no difference between the holy and the profane, neither have they shown difference between the clean and the unclean, and they hid their eyes from my Sabbaths, and they profaned among them. Her princes midst thereof are like wolves ravening prey, to shed blood and to destroy the honest gain. And her prophets have deceived them with untempered mortification, and divining lies unto them. Thus saith the Lord God, when the Lord has spoken." JOHN H. HAY

OUR latest advices by cable and letter from India show that there is no improvement in the situation, and that suffering and bitter want must continue for some time longer. Indeed it is feared the worst crisis has not yet been felt. Reading this fact and all it portends, the gifts of our readers are hailed with joy and in every village they are saving multitudes of lives. The missionaries, whose hearts were sinking at the sight of the thousands of dying people whose war they were unable to relieve, have taken new courage when they heard of the sympathy aroused among the Christians of America and are setting about the work of relief with renewed ardor. The third remittance of thirty thousand dollars which, as announced last week, has been sent to them by the Board will show them that Christian America is standing by them in the crisis and is resolved to support them in their Christ-like labor.

Distributing the money, as will be seen by the list of missionaries published on this page, our chief concern was to send the help to the districts in which it was most urgently needed. In some of those districts the missionary was a Methodist; in others a Baptist; in others a Congregationalist, and so on, but the consideration of denominational affiliation could not be allowed to weigh in the face of a calamity so appalling as this. It has happened that the greatest number of the two districts, Methodist missionaries are in charge. A large part of the activities of the Church lies within the famine belt and many of the missionaries are sorely pressed by the claims of their own converts, by the number of orphans who have been brought to them and by the people whose suffering is their only plea for help. We therefore asked the Methodist Board to send five hundred dollars to each of the ten missionaries whom we knew to be in need of help and we sent a further sum of four thousand dollars to Bishop Thoburn and one thousand dollars to Dr. Parker to be assigned by them to such missionaries as had appealed to them for help in their work of feeding the starving. Bishop Thoburn has now appointed a famine-relief committee to administer this fund so that prompt aid can be sent to any part of the field when the appeals from the missionaries are received. The missionaries of the Christian Alliance and workers of the Salvation Army have also been included in the list, as they are doing relief work and need help.

Five thousand dollars have also been sent to Mr. Benjamin Aitken of Calcutta, apportioned by him to the missionaries whose efforts to relieve the suffering he has seen and whose need he knows. Mr. Aitken is in touch with missionaries throughout India, being himself the son of a missionary and having spent all his life in the land, and at the present time, although a lay journalist, reserving a considerable portion of his time for gratuitous missionary labor. Mr. Aitken speaks Hindoostanee and several native dialects, and probably knows better than any man in India the condition of the people and the best ways of helping them. He was laboring in India during the great famine of 1877, and personally investigated the relief system adopted at that time. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD counts itself fortunate in having the services of so experienced and capable a representative, and is sure that the money placed in his hands for distribution through missionary channels will be wisely and faithfully administered.

hungry people going to and fro. The only evidence of the possibility of dishonesty was that some of the merchants had armed themselves with sticks to drive off any starving creature who tried to filch a handful of grain.

The following extracts from letters just received from our missionary distributors, show how widespread is the suffering and how valuable and timely is the aid afforded by the gifts of our readers:

Rev. Henry J. Bruce, the American

FAMINE SUFFERERS AT THE GOVERNMENT RELIEF WORKS.

In various places throughout the Famine districts of India the Government has commenced public works of different kinds for the sake of giving employment to the starving people. The illustration is taken from a photograph of one of these, in which the work is the construction of tanks. The men and women earn a scanty wage by carrying the soil from the excavation in baskets on their heads. The tanks when completed will be a protection from famine in the future by storing the water for irrigation.

It was also deemed advisable to render aid to that distinguished native worker, Pandita Ramabai, who is making noble efforts to save the child-widows of India. She was herself a famine child, both her parents having perished of hunger in the famine of 1877. She has consequently a fellow-feeling with her suffering sisters, and is working indefatigably for their relief. Pandita Ramabai is well known in this country, where she was educated, and her friends testify to her high Christian character and her intelligence and culture. The work she is doing is sorely in need of funds, and we have therefore sent one thousand dollars of this third remittance to her for the succor of the widows.

THE DYING PEOPLE.

One of the most pathetic characteristics of the famine is the sad patience which the people display under suffering which would goad almost any other people to deeds of violence. Mr. Aitken writes: "In Kutnee, at the very beginning of the famine, I saw victims dying at the rate of fifteen a day. Three expired before my eyes, and the enclosure where they had taken refuge was strewn with fifty breathing skeletons who were all to die within four days. Two dead bodies partly devoured by jackals had been found in the morning within a short distance of the railroad station. Yet that very day the native grain merchants had their stocks spread out on the ground within a few inches of the

The famine is affecting seriously more than eighty millions of people. None of the many famines in India's sad history ever affected as many as this. . . . Being in a condition to know the needs of the people, we missionaries most willingly act as the agents of any of God's children who wish to feed the hungry. The hardest time is coming in about two months [June-July] and if it please God we hope to be able to help many at that trying season, when the Government will be utterly unable to meet all the needs.

Rev. E. W. Parker, of the Methodist Mission at Shahjahanpore, says:

Rest assured that your money is being used by as faithful and conscientious men and women as India has—men and women who have given their lives for this people and love them as they love their own souls. We think a very severe pinch will yet come and that we shall see still harder times within the next few months. In any case, we shall need help later. We must care for the children, especially the girls, and their parents will never be found. Our plan is to care for children, for widows, and helpless one, and to keep Christians from starving. This first; then we help other distressed ones as we can.

Rev. E. S. Hume, one of the American Board's missionaries at Byculla, Bombay, writes:

I have been using your money to feed and clothe the needy and also for saving a goodly number of children. The Lord reward you and all who have helped in this good work! I need more money and hope that you can send it to me. Every cent shall be carefully used. As we see to the distribution personally, we know that nothing is wasted and that none but the most worthy and needy receive help. Accept our most sincere thanks.

From Mrs. J. C. Lawson, Methodist Episcopal Missionary at Aligarh, comes a most grateful letter describing the bitter need there and saying how much help the former remittance is giving. She tells horrible details of the things the hungry children have been driven to eat to assuage the pangs of hunger and adds that she dare not tell all she has seen there do. It would be too shocking. She adds:

Hunger is an awful thing. Death by starvation must surely be the worst death possible. Do help us to care for the orphans. We do not know when we will be able to stop taking in these little ones. No one would believe the first batch we took were ever famine children. They look so well now and are learning nicely. The more recent ones are still very weak. I have been nursing them since February. They were in such an awful condition! Still, we are now ready to take another lot. We expect them this week. We began this work when we had almost nothing, but God has honored our faith. I hope you will be able to remember us again very soon. Our house is full but we have land and if we had more money we could put up some sheds and take in more children.

Rev. M. B. Adams, Bilaspur, India (April 26), writes: "The distress of the famine is not yet at its height, and there can be no possible relief until November and December, when the first harvest may be expected. Deaths from starvation are common occurrences."

Rev. J. W. Denning, Narsinghpur (April 28), writes: "There are eighteen counties in the Central Provinces, and this is one of the three worst afflicted with the famine. It is the fourth year of poor crops. I cannot describe the awful suffering that prevailed before Dec. 1st, when the Government relief began. Hundreds all about us died. I have seen scores of emaciated forms lying by the roadside under the trees in the fields dying of hunger, and the diseases induced by lack of food.

The sweepers would see dead, report to the police, and take them off to bury them. Parents brought their children to me. Some wanted to sell them; some simply asked that the children be fed. Many children came of themselves. We rescued three hundred and sent them to various missionary schools. One day, ten mothers signed bonds, giving me their ten little girls never expecting to see the girls again."

Rev. H. J. Bruce, Panchgavi, Satara District (April 26), writes: "Our Famine Relief Camp near Satara has suddenly been broken up by a serious outbreak of cholera. One of my (native) Christian preachers who lives near the place writes: 'So many men died that some bodies were left three days unburied. Back of my house there are some Mango trees, and under these trees seven men died. All about this village the dead corpses lie, and one day ten thousand people ran away. The native doctor in charge of the camp died on the 24th with cholera. I have given medicine to many, and I believe I have saved about one hundred persons.'

A letter has been received by Dr. Klopsch from the Viceroy of India, expressing the warmest thanks of the distinguished writer and the Viceregal Committee for the relief thus far sent by America to famine-stricken India.

Board's Missionary at Satara, in the course of a letter giving a shocking description of jackals devouring the bodies of the dead near his station, says:

It was no less a surprise than a pleasure to receive this generous help from friends in America for the great reductions in our mission appropriations have made us almost helpless to do anything ourselves directly for the suffering people. . . . There is intense suffering among the people in many directions.

In a letter dated April 22, from Hurda in the Central Provinces, Rev. G. L. Wharton, a missionary of the Church of the Disciples, outlines a plan for helping the farmers cultivate their land. They will, it appears, need help, as they have no seed corn, the cattle with which they do their farm work are dead and the implements have been sold for food. Mr. Wharton writes:

Your generous and sympathetic gift for the famine-stricken people has been received by cable, and has already fed the hungry in numbers. Please accept my personal thanks to you and those you represent for enabling me to do what is needed to save life in many a case. . . . You know the famine is so widespread that prices of grain have risen beyond the reach of the poor in all parts of India.

A Trip to Foreign Parts.

IF you want rest, there is nothing better. From the day you leave the American dock to the day when you land in Genoa, if you take the Mediterranean route, you have not been able to transact an item of business. You have been trying to keep a journal to send back home on the first steamer. But even that becomes monotonous and tiresome. It is the same thing day after day. Every day you take your shawls and your books, and betake yourself to the deck, wrap yourself up to read, or doze, or fall fast asleep to the motion of the great cradle in which Neptune is rocking you. Now and then you meet a vessel, see a distant group of islands; but there is nothing that disturbs your tendency to let the world wag as it will, and to make the best of your situation, which you do.

READING UP FOR THE TRIP.

If you are wise, you have done this before you start; you already have your itinerary; know the place where you are going, and what you want to see there. There is nothing more bewildering, for example, than the thought of such a peopled wilderness as London and Paris, without knowing where to go, or what to do there. But, if you have not given the matter any thought, you must address yourself to it on board the steamer. Doubtless, you will find traveled people, who will gladly tell you what you want to know. At any rate, you can have recourse to your guide-book. There you will find it all mapped out for you. Hotels, with prices, alternative routes; wonderful things in the way of scenery, or buildings, or art. And the continent is all before you, where to choose.

AS TO YOUR TRAPS.

You want to travel as a light-armed soldier, encumbered with only what you can yourself carry. This saves time and expense. And you never lose your luggage. If luggage accumulates, divide it up, and send some of it to some onward point by express; let it await you, where you are to take steamer on your way home. When you are aboard you have no dignity to maintain. Nobody knows you. You have no care to keep up appearances. Go easily and comfortably and economically.

In travels abroad all things but God's things are foreign. The sun, the clouds, the stars you know. The seas, the rivers you know. But the people are new. They drive their horses differently, milk their cows differently; the barbers are different, the boot-blacks. They put the bell in the station, and not on the locomotive. Women are station and signal-men, and not men. Women are in the fields at work. The bread tastes differently. You are afraid of the water. And when you go to sleep between two feather beds, you rather long for cool sheets, and light coverlets that lie so gently on you in your own America.

THE HAVEN OF HOME.

Traveling is good for a change. But there is no situation in which one's native land seems so attractive as when he is trying to talk some foreign language in a strange city. He sees familiar objects around him, knows what he wants, but he has no word that the people around him can understand. He tries to talk, they shake their heads or turn away with a smile. How sweet to land on the dock, and hear again American voices! And soon he adjusts himself to home habits of dress and diet and work. And before a week is gone, it seems as though his wanderings in strange lands were only a dream.

Beware of Politics.

HE who enlists in political life for his country's good, does well, does righteously; but he who enters it for aggrandizement or emolument will find a hundred exasperations to one satisfaction. Out of three million people in a state only one can be governor. Out of sixty million people in the land, only one can be president. Out of two hundred thousand people in a city, only one can be mayor. So that in great political contests, to one person gratified, thousands are disappointed. The same amount of genius used in mechanical, or mercantile, or professional directions would run much less chance of defeat. Ambition for the presidency slew some of the strongest men of our own generation. Aspiration for the presidency is a fatality. Politics as a trade is the poorest business. In nine cases out of ten the man dies poor and dissipated. The most brilliant man of his time, from one term in Congress at Washington, went home so thoroughly captured of intemperance that at forty years of age he lay down to die. Keep out of politics unless you have a direct call from heaven for their purgation.

Occidental Civilization.

OCCEIDENTAL civilization! This is the trouble in Cuba. It is the trouble in Crete. It is working like leaven; till the world is leavened. What shall we do about it? Where are our sympathies? Can our public men say something as Webster did, to cheer the people that are fighting the same battle that was on us when Lafayette came from France? Occidental civilization is merely asserting itself. It is the civilization which the Bible inspires. We thus judge: If preaching the truths of the Bible makes people long for self-government, long for constitutional rights, then it is God's work. Let it go on! It must be civilization, Occidental or Oriental: either tyranny or freedom. When we pray, "Thy Kingdom come!" what do we mean by it? We mean the state, the family, the school of Christianity.

The American idea is this: Every man should participate in the Government. The Government is for the people, and not the people for the Government. What is the trouble in Cuba? The Cubans want Cuba Libre! This means they want a chance to say what shall be law, and who shall administer law. What a maternal thing it would be if Spain should say: "These people are my children; if they are restless and discontented, what is the matter? Let us see if we cannot comfort and content them." The Cubans are not fighting for the fun of it. They have felt the uplift of free institutions. They have heard "Yar-kee Doodle" and "The Star Spangled Banner." They can not get them out of their ears.

NEVER SATISFIED.

THAT is the grumbler! He finds it so easy to account for all his follies and mistakes, by grumbling; for while the habit infers his own blamelessness, it does not appeal in any way to conscience. If, however, we examine the class of men who are habitual grumblers, we shall find that the fault is not inherent as they suppose in environment, or even temperament, but is the result of circumstances, which can be controlled. In the first place, grumblers are usually dabblers in their daily work. They know a good deal superficially, nothing perfectly; and such knowledge is out of touch with our time, when specialties concentrating a man's whole life and genius, are the elements of success. They have ideas, but they bring nothing to perfection; and then they grumble, because the world will not pay for unfinished work.

Another class of grumblers are men with too much leisure. Busy men are seldom grumblers; they have no time for looking back, and the material for complaining, lies in retrospect. Men who have real work to fill all their hours, keep no catalogue of their wrongs; and even a positive injury or injustice, does not rankle or worry them into a constant fret and complaint about it.

Some people grumble because they think it adds to their importance not to be too easily pleased. They cannot take Love at its word, they find a flaw in friendship; if any work is done for them they hesitate and wonder about its worth and value; all the time being conscious that the work is good work, and well worth a genuine word of praise. If they go to church, and the sermon is faultless, the minister's manner or voice is disagreeable, or the singing offends. If they go to a concert and the singing was beyond caviar, then the selections were bad. Goldsmith left a golden rule for such grumblers—"Say the picture would have been better painted, or the book better written, if the author had taken more pains." In such a remark, a grumble is successfully achieved without even the greatest ignorance committing itself.

It is then evident that grumblers are not worthy of any sympathy; indeed, all a grumbler wants is to be listened to—that the courtesy of men usually give, though reluctantly; for the complaints of a grumbler are endless. The weather never suits their health, or their plans; every person they do business with, is in a conspiracy to cheat them, and even in public affairs they are not satisfied—the country is going to ruin, the good men, the honest politicians are all dead and buried. Yet no special element of ill-nature enters into these woful complainings; indeed if all the hard things grumblers say, were written down, they would be ashamed to read them. The truth is that a great deal of grumbling comes from too much comfort. One luxury has begot another luxury, until the most trifling inconveniences are unbearable. The men with real grievances do not grumble half as detestably, as the men who have nothing to grumble about.

For we must all have noticed that it is the little troubles of life which men complain of. A grumbler will often bear nobly the loss of a limb, or a fortune, and yet fret like a baby over a collar with too much starch in it, or a garment without a button, or a dinner not cooked to his liking—fret and complain as poor men starving and shivering in the street never fret. And what is the good of complaining? It never yet cured a single trouble. And suppose we really have an annoyance to complain about? Very likely, if we examine it honestly, we shall find that we have brought it on ourselves, either by our carelessness, or inattention, or folly. Even if we are certain that we are in no way to blame, there remains the fact that no human being escapes perplexity and injustice, and that we have no special right of exemption.

Surely it is only necessary to look around on the gigantic sorrows of life—war, pestilence, sin, suffering, poverty, and ignorance—and then hold our peace from any words but those of thanks and praise. If the grumbler would make one effort, and try cheerfulness instead of complaining, he would come into the sunshine, and not only bless himself, but also all those who came nigh him. For cheerfulness is a moral tonic, it is the life of life, as any one may perceive who simply watches a cheerful man or woman enter a room where two or three are sitting, grumbling and complaining. There are even times when this cheerful spirit is a kind of magnanimity, when it outlooks the clouds of the present, and breathes on every trouble hope's perpetual strength, turning the anxious to-day into the prosperous confident to-morrow; for

God is good and gives new gladness,
When the old he takes away.

And as a last objection, we will suppose that we do not always get what we have worked for, and believe we merit, what reason have we for grumbling? Is this world all? Are there no rewards but temporal ones? Is it well to grumble and complain at our day's work? No! there is a better way—let us serve and sow, and therewith be content, for even as we toil, the Lord of Harvest will come.

BRIEF NOTES.

The Young Men's Christian Association of North London, recently held mass meetings in various districts with the result that two hundred and fifty were added to the fellowship of the church.

Wu Ting Fang, the new Chinese minister to the United States, who has lately arrived in this country, is a Christian and has received a European education. In his suite are some of the distinguished Chinamen ever accredited to our country.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has been holding meetings at Los Angeles, Cal. The large auditorium of the Simpson Tabernacle has been crowded with people. The young people's meetings were especially well attended. It is believed a work of grace has been commenced which is permanent and widespread.

Chaplain Laslett of the State Penitentiary at Fort Madison, Iowa, would be glad to send copies of this journal from any subscription to him. They are, he says, acceptable reading for the prisoners. Mr. Laslett recently held evangelistic meetings in various parts of the State, which were blessed to many souls.

The report of missionary progress in the United States, shows that there are now in the territory upwards of 57,000 "readers," that is, persons who are learning to read. There are 321 churches, and nearly 20,000 people. About 100 copies of the New Testament of Gospel have been sold, and the baptized Christians over 6,000.

Evangelist John McNeill held service week in Brooklyn, N. Y., at Hanson Place Church and Lafayette Presbyterian Church. He brought his mission in this country to a close, numbers of persons have attended the preaching, the famous evangelist and many letters have been sent to him testifying of blessing received in his labors.

The new treasurer of the Presbyterian Foreign Mission is Mr. Charles W. L. of Brooklyn, an elder in the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church. Mr. Hand who has been successor to Mr. Wm. Dulles, Jr., was educated in the legal profession, but has for some years conducted the business of an extensive corporation in New York.

Florence Nightingale, the heroine of Crimean hospitals, has just celebrated her seventh birthday. Miss Nightingale has been invalid for the last forty years, and spends her time at Claydon, in the beautiful county of her nephew. Her mind is as strong as ever, she takes an active interest in all kinds of work and relief work.

At the thirteenth anniversary of the End Mission Boston, Mass., recently held, stated that of the 204 women who during the past year had passed through the Rescue Home conducted by the Mission 107 had been either restored to families, or positions had been found for them. The visitors at the Mission was a man who had been converted there twenty-one years before.

A missionary journal states that the mission of the Moravians has now three nuns, eight minor stations, with a staff of four nuns, eight female missionaries. They make a total of 450 church members and 175 children as well as their missions. It is proposed to open a station at Ramiah. The good brethren are interested by the fact that the thermometer during winter registers forty-one degrees below zero.

The Open-Air Workers' Association elected Dr. Teunis S. Hamlin, of Washington, D. C., its president, at its recent annual meeting. Representative pastors and evangelists were vice-presidents. It was stated in the course of the proceedings that there were now over thirty in which Gospel wagons were used. Inspecting the work of the Association which has been carried on for five years, may be obtained by sending a self-addressed stamped envelope to V. Prentice, 123 Amity Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

In his new work on Arctic Exploration Nansen gives the following emphatic testimony of total abstinence: "It is often said that even though spirits are not intended to be used they ought to be taken on an expedimental purpose. I would readily acknowledge this if any one could show me a single case in which such a remedy is necessary; but till this shall maintain that this pretext is not valid, and that the best course is to brush alcohol from the list of necessities for an Arctic expedition."

At the celebration in New York on the occasion of Bishop Andrews' twenty-fifth anniversary, he quoted the following figures, showing the progress of the Methodist Episcopal Church during the past quarter century. In 1872 there were about 9,000 effective preachers, now there are more than 14,000. There were about 1,400,000 church members, now there are 2,800,000. The number of churches had increased from 13,000 to 20,000. The bishop expressed a wish that there had been a corresponding increase in spirituality, of which he had some doubt.

The Sunday Breakfast Association of Philadelphia celebrated its nineteenth anniversary recently. It was stated that during the past year 43,366 had availed themselves of a free meal. At the meetings held by the association 4874 persons had asked for prayer, 1874 had signed the temperance pledge. The association has conducted meetings at the Association has conducted school and kindergarten and has carried on industrial Rescue Home. The Rev. R. E. F. has accepted the invitation of the Association to devote himself to the philanthropic and social work it has in progress and in contemplation.

The China Inland mission has now been operating thirty-two years in China. From a review of its work published by the Missionary Review of the World, it appears that when it first began, only two of the inland provinces were open to Christian workers. Now, largely through its service, only two are in any sense closed. There are 296 stations and out-stations have been established and there are 342 native helpers, working with nearly 700 missionaries. There are 5,000 stations with mission churches about 5,000. Over 8,000 have been baptized, and Dr. J. Taylor has recently estimated that between 20,000 men and women have been brought to the Lord through the instrumentality of mission workers.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

THE SULTAN'S TRIUMPH.

HOW largely the future peace of Europe depends on the character of the Sultan of Turkey, is indicated by recent cable dispatches. If he is really the timid, pusillanimous creature that he is represented as being, peace may be established. But if he is a bold man, determined on securing substantial gains, the triumphs of his army in Greece, probable that there will be trouble. An army of three hundred thousand at the seat of war, all eager for and ready for action. If, flushed with victory and confident of his power, should insist on gaining an accession of territory, he may bid defiance to the European powers and may make an obstinate struggle to accomplish his ends. England, France and Austria may be expected to resist his adding to his empire any large portion of territory inhabited by Christians. If the Governments of the nations were disposed to acquiesce in the extension of Turkish dominion, the peoples could protest, and in England and France it is not likely that the Government to oppose the national will. Nevertheless, the Sultan might brave the hostility of those three powers if he could be assured of the moral support of Germany and Russia. It can be supposed that he would resist the united pressure of all the five powers, if he is convinced that it would lead to the extremity of a war. A brave man, or a man might do so, especially if he had a force like that which Turkey now has on the European conflict; but fanatical fanaticism is believed to be, not credited with the ability required to defy united Europe. The statement is made that Turkey and Greece negotiate directly with a view to peace, but there can be no doubt that any treaty they make will have to undergo the sanction of Europe. It remains to be seen whether if the Sultan consents to yield her provinces to the Sultan as the result of defeat, Europe will consent to the transfer, and if she will enforce her will if the Sultan resists. It is probable for Greece that she is not to offer the Sultan a large money indemnity in lieu of territory. Greece is in need of both money and credit. Her financial conduct has given her a bad reputation in the money markets of the world, so that she would find it difficult to borrow money with which to pay a heavy indemnity. Her condition is truly pitiable, and unless the powers interpose, she is at the mercy of her foe, who occupies a position from which he could overrun her at will. She has need to pray for deliverance to Him who, in a similar crisis, heard the petitions of his people and said to his powerful enemy:

Because thy rage against me and thy arrogance have stirred me to mine ears, therefore will I put a bridle in thy nose and a bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest. (K. 19: 25.)

Marriage in Mockery.

The extraordinary conduct of a bride in the State of Washington is occasioning much and great distress of mind. According to The Walla Walla Statesman, it publishes the story of the marriage of a subsequent trouble, the lady was shown marriage by a suitor to whom at first she showed little favor. He pressed her, however, and suddenly her manner changed and she gave consent and a speedy wedding. The young man was too ready to gratify her. The wedding was solemnized with due form the bride's father giving her away at the altar and a troop of friends offering congratulations. During the wedding festivities the bride retired to change her dress for the wedding journey. She was a long time absent, but the bridegroom was not worried as he was enjoying himself with his bachelor friends. But after the lapse of more than an hour he went in search of his wife, and found to his amazement that she had disappeared. She had entered the carriage alone and had driven away. He has been unable to find her since, and a request has been conveyed to him from his wife that he discontinue his search, as she does not intend to live with him. She says she never loved him, but she married him in order to escape from an unhappy home. Her father was a cruel tyrant and she could think of no way of getting from under his jurisdiction but by a marriage. The husband is sorrowful and indignant, and justly denounces her for assuming a wife's name when she did not intend to perform a wife's duties. It is not often that a woman will do so reprehensible a thing, but there are many who take a similar course in religion. They join a church and take on themselves the name of Christians, hoping thereby to escape the penalty threatened against sinners, but they do nothing for Christ, nor live as Christians ought to live.

Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven. (Matt. 7: 21.)

To Talk with Martians.

A communication to the New York Herald announces an important discovery which, it is suggested, may ultimately enable us to hear noises on the planets and possibly to hold converse with their inhabitants if they have any. Electricians have been searching for sometime for some means of telephonic communication which did not require a wire between the two points. In experimenting with this object in view Prof. Alexander G. Bell has made the discovery that rays of light may be made the bearers of sound. In the ordinary telephone the wire does not convey the air waves, of which sound consists, but merely causes a reproduction, at one end of the wire, of the waves made by the speaker's voice at the other end of the wire. This is done by the sensitive diaphragm in the transmitter collecting the waves which are reproduced by the sensitive carbon in the receiver. Proceeding on a parallel principle, with a ray of light instead of a wire, it was necessary to find some material as sensitive to light as carbon is to electricity. This material Prof. Bell found in the metal known as selenium, and he discovered a means of indefinitely increasing its sensitiveness by the application of heat. The next step was to produce the alterations of the ray of light corresponding to those produced by the diaphragm on electricity. This was done by a fine convex mirror of silvered mica, which, as a transmitter, by means of a lens, focused a ray of light on the selenium. So delicately was it adjusted that if the mirror changed its shape from convex to concave, the focus fell short of the selenium, and the impact of a speaker's voice on a mirror was sufficient to do this. While the mirror was convex, the focus was on the selenium and, when the impact of the voice changed it to concave, the focus was off and the selenium responded to each change. Prof. Bell believes that when this system is perfected, the selenium will register the tone of voice as accurately as the carbon now does in the telephone and with no other medium than a ray of light. If light can thus be made the bearer of sound, we have at last the germ of the means so long sought for inter-stellar communication. A long step in this direction has certainly been taken in the discovery of a substance so sensitive as selenium. It is that difficulty that keeps us from receiving heavenly communications:

The heart of the people is waxed gross and their ears are dull of hearing... lest they should hear with their ears and understand with their heart and should be converted. (Acts 28: 27.)

A Double Funeral.

One of the most remarkable funerals on record is that described by an undertaker in Tennessee. It was that of a widow and her son who were buried at the same time and in the same grave, though there had been an interval of over thirty years between their deaths. The son had been killed in the battle of Murfreesboro, in January, 1863, fighting in the Confederate army. He was the widow's only son, and she almost idolized him. His death was so terrible a shock to her that it was feared she would lose her reason. She insisted that the body should not be buried, and in that time of confusion she had her way. An air-tight cedar coffin with a glass top was prepared, and the body of the young man placed in it. The widow had it placed in the room in the old homestead which her son had formerly occupied, and there in the very spot where the young man had been accustomed to sit singing his merry songs, reading his favorite books and pursuing the cheerful life which had now come to so tragic a termination, it remained, among his books, fishing-rods, and other possessions. The widow would go there frequently and remain for hours. The body did not decay, but in process of time it dessicated. The widow left instructions that it should be buried with her, and when she died, her fond wishes were carried out. Every one must sympathize with such sorrow as her retention of her son's corpse implies. It deserves sympathy, on account not only of its intensity, but its hopelessness. The body she cherished so long, could never again be the abode of the son whom she loved; her only ground of hope lay in his receiving through faith in Christ that new body which the Bible assures us will be given to those who die in Jesus.

It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. (1 Cor. 15: 44.)

A Wounded Heart Healed.

Every day brings tidings of some new victory in the field of operative surgery, these triumphs being mainly due to the judicious boldness of professional men, aided by the antiseptic method and increased knowledge of anæsthetics. At Berlin recently Herr Relin, of Frankfurt-on-the-Main, astonished the learned members of the Surgical Congress by recounting his experiences in the treatment of wounded hearts. It has always been held that ninety per cent. of such cases must prove fatal, death being caused either by shock or by the flow of blood into the pericardial cavity, whereby the heart's action is gradually brought to a standstill. Hitherto no serious attempts have been made to save the patient's life. Herr Relin, however, conceived the daring idea of applying precisely the same treatment that would be used in the case of an external wound. A man was brought into the hospital dying from a stab wound in the heart. The doctor laid bare the organ, and succeeded in checking the hemorrhage by means of a suture. The patient made a capital recovery and was produced before the congress alive and well. He appeared to have no difficulty of breathing or any of the other symptoms of trouble with the heart that are usually observed. This is one of the greatest triumphs of modern surgery, which seems to be increasing continually in knowledge and skill. It cannot help us, however, in the far more common trouble of the heart full of evil propensities. For this there is only one cure and it is the one that has been available from the beginning.

A new heart also will I give you and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh; and I will give you a heart of flesh. (Ezek. 36: 26.)

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Paul's Advice to Timothy.

Sunday School Lesson for June 13. 2.Tim. 1: 1-7; 3: 14-17. Golden Text: 2.Tim. 3:15.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

It was something more than advice which Paul gave to Timothy, his "own son in the faith." (1. Tim. 1: 2.) It was not that which an older and more experienced man would give out of his own wisdom to a younger and less experienced man. It was a charge, an authoritative commission, which he, as an instrument passed on from God to his young and beloved disciple. "This charge I commit unto thee, son Timothy," he says (1. Tim. 1: 18), when he calls upon him to "war a good warfare." And, in a yet more solemn way, when he is instructing him in the solemn duties of his office as an overseer, he says, "I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels, that thou observe these things."

Paul's second epistle to Timothy was his last charge, or at least his last written charge, to this beloved younger brother, of whom he had written, "I have no man like minded." (Phil. 2: 20.) It speaks the character of him who wrote and of him to whom he wrote. To his dearly beloved son, Paul gives first a blessing, a greeting in the authority of God whose chosen instrument he himself was, "Grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord. Oh, this

HOLY LETTER WRITING!

How far short we all come of this habit of Paul's to write God's greeting as the beginning of all our letters! In German Switzerland, the salutation of a casual passer-by is not, "Good-morning, but "God greets thee." If it were spoken in faith, what an amount of blessing might be called down from heaven each day by true disciples even on passers-by!

Paul thanks God that without ceasing he remembers Timothy. He does not look upon it as a matter of course. He who would commit a charge to Timothy has received Timothy as a charge from God. His remembrance of him was in itself a gift of God: he could not of himself have held on faithfully in prayer for him night and day. The old man's heart yearned to see Timothy once more before he should suffer martyrdom, not to seek sympathy of Timothy over his own fate. No tears of his own occupied him, but he was mindful of Timothy's tears, and by reminding him of the unfeigned faith of his mother and of his grandmother, Paul puts his disciple in remembrance since there is, he is persuaded, unfeigned faith in him to stir up into a flame (R.V. margin), the gift of God which is in him by the putting on of Paul's hands. There was more in him than he knew, but like many a young disciple, Timothy's tendency was to expect from himself and his own resources what could only come from the indwelling Christ, who dwells in our hearts by faith through the Holy Ghost. That Timothy was discouraged is clear from the words which follow, words which God has used by the Holy Spirit to help thousands of tremulous children of God. "For God gave us not a spirit of fearfulness; but of power and love and discipline." (11. Tim. 1: 7, R.V.) The fears, the weakness, the failure, the continual disappointment of Timothy arose, not from the fact that Christ was not in him, but that he was looking to himself and not to Christ for the grace which he so sorely needed, and for which he wept. He needed to stir up, not his efforts, but his faith in the Spirit of God who was indeed within him. He needed not to discipline himself so much as to recognize and yield to the Spirit of God. Weak as he was discovering himself to be, the Spirit of power was in him, but only the exercise of his faith, which Paul knew to be unfeigned, would stir up into a flame the latent divine force.

Timothy was in danger of being ashamed, things had not turned out as he had expected: his beloved father in Christ was a prisoner in Rome for the second time; the prayers of the faithful had not succeeded in liberating him as Peter was set free when the Church had prayed for him (Acts 12.) It looked as though Paul, like his Master, would be executed as though he were a criminal; how could the Gospel succeed if the greatest pillar of the truth were to be thus associated with ignominy? Poor Timothy! he needed the lesson of Ps. 73, he could only understand the inexplicable when he went "into the sanctuary of God."

to him the cross, the shame, the failure were the royal path to glory: his charge to Timothy was: "Be not ashamed therefore of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner, but suffer hardship with the Gospel according to the power of God, who saved us and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before times eternal, but hath now been manifested by the appearing of our Saviour Christ Jesus, who abolished death and brought life and incorruption to light through the Gospel" (11. Timothy 1: 3-10, R.V.) Life and incorruption! This was what Paul saw—hardship, shame, death were only the path to it. Paul knew as Peter knew something of what it meant that he was born again, not of corruptible seed but of incorruptible, even by the Word of God which liveth and abideth forever (1. Peter 1: 23), he knew within him "the power of an endless life" (Heb. 7: 16.) He had seen the glory of his calling, and taught Timothy: For this cause "I am not ashamed;" "Be not thou ashamed." I suffer hardship" (11. Tim. 2: 9); suffer thou also hardship. "I endure all things for the elect's sake;" but if we die with him, we shall also live with him; if we endure, we shall also reign with him (11. Tim. 2: 11, 12, R.V.) Therefore Timothy, "give diligence to present thyself unto God a workman that needeth not be ashamed" (ver 15).

It was thus that Paul prepared Timothy for the unexpected announcement that in the last days, instead of things growing better, perilous times should come, and this not among the untaught heathen, but among such as should have "a form [literally a kind] of godliness," but who, by their unchristlike lives, should "deny the power thereof." God was showing to Paul now what nearly thirty years afterwards he showed to the beloved John, of the defection of the Church, and yet at the same time that in the midst of her apostasy, there should be a company in her midst which had an ear to hear "what the Spirit saith unto the Churches," and who, in the midst of a Church which succumbs to the world, are in her very midst recognized of God as they that overcome. (Rev. 2: 3.) Thus he tells Timothy that men having a form of godliness, a sort of conversion, shall be "lovers of their own selves, and covetous instead of denying themselves; "boasters," "proud," "heady," "highminded," instead of "lowly in heart" like Jesus; "blasphemers," instead of God's witnesses, "disobedient to parents," "without natural affection," instead of honoring father and mother; "unthankful," instead of "giving thanks always for all things;" "unholy," "truce breakers, false accusers," "fierce traitors," instead of being followers of the Lamb; "incontinent, despisers of those that are good," "lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God;" and all this under the name of God! Having a form of godliness not simply of religion but godliness, "but denying the power thereof."

"But thou [Timothy] hast fully known my manner of life... what persecutions I endured... Yea; and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution" (vers. 10-12). And be not surprised: things will wax "worse and worse," not better and better. But in the midst of all there is a clear path traced for thy feet. "Continue thou in the things which thou hast learned, and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them, and that from a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Jesus Christ" (vers. 14, 15). This is the sheet anchor, the Scriptures appropriated and obeyed by faith. Here is charge to every Christian: Continue—go on in the Scripture, live in the Word of God: it brings the atmosphere of God with it. The Word of God, while it tells us the truth about ourselves and about the world and the Church, always gives the other side, it tells us of our God, of his purposes, of the end of all his dealings with us, and with the Church and the world, until we are filled with admiration and adoration of our God.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE Epistles of Timothy have not escaped the assaults of the critics. It has been contended on various grounds that they were not written by the Apostle Paul. The evidence for their authority is, however, overwhelming and the teacher may, without hesitation, treat them as genuine. They were apparently written after the period described in the closing words of the Acts of the Apostles, when Paul had been released from his long imprisonment, and had taken the journey to Spain referred to by Clement. The first Epistle appears to have been written from Macedonia; but before the second was written, Paul was once more in jail and nearing the end of his career. The Epistle breathes a very tender affection and was clearly written to one whom the great Apostle dearly loved. In his exquisite analysis of these letters, Plummer says: "Of all whom he converted to the faith, Timothy seems to have been to Paul the disciple who was most beloved. He shared his spiritual father's outward labors and most intimate thoughts. He was with him when the Apostle could not, or would not, have the companionship of others. He was sent on the most delicate and confidential missions. He had charge of the most important congregations. When the Apostle was in his last and almost solitary imprisonment, it was Timothy whom he summoned to console him and receive his last injunctions." He was probably a lad of fifteen or thereabouts when he was converted under Paul's preaching at Lystra, and may have been about thirty-five when this letter was written to him. He was the son of a Greek father and a Jewish mother, and although the latter had brought him up in her own faith, he had not been admitted by the Jewish rite into the privileges of Jewish nationality. But Paul, foreseeing the prejudices that might be excited against him on that account, had him circumcised before making him his companion. Very little is known of him besides what is told in the Acts and what can be gleaned from Paul's epistles, but tradition says that after Paul's death he was bishop or overseer of the Church at Ephesus, and suffered martyrdom there. One legend has it that he incurred popular odium by protesting against the licentious worship of Diana, and was set upon by the mob and slain.

"ALL SCRIPTURE IS GIVEN BY INSPIRATION."

Paul was in depression when he wrote this letter. He was looking forward to speedy, and probably a cruel death, was prematurely aged and enfeebled by his stormy life and the exposure to rough treatment he had borne, his spirit was strong and his concern for the work was unabated. It was not the prospect of suffering and death that oppressed him so much, as the fear that there was no longer with the churches the planted, they would relapse. He foresaw signs which disturbed him, of false doctrine and of tendencies which, if unchecked, would subvert the faith. Joined with this anxiety was a concern about Timothy himself. We gather from the epistle that the young man was courageous. He may have felt hopeless in the presence of opposition and converts. He had not Paul's disinclined spirit. Paul felt that if he lost heart the situation was indeed desperate, and this epistle, which was doubtless written after the one to Titus, and was the last the great Apostle ever wrote, was written mainly to strengthen his disciple and inspire him with his indomitable courage. That is the purpose of the letter, and he tells Timothy that in time of stress he may keep his faith and renew his faith. It is this counsel which makes the epistle valuable in these days when the young Christian is assailed with subtlety and the sophistry that is harder to combat than persecution.

All Scripture is given by inspiration of God. The Revised Version has it, "Scripture inspired of God is also able," etc., which is not quite the thing. There are many scriptural writings that are not inspired of God, we know that the Bible is inspired, cause of its effects on those who receive their lives by it. Theodore Monod, that a sea captain who had been in the habit of reading the Bible with his crew, had his ship dismasted and all washed away by a storm off Cape Verde. Writing afterwards of the contents between his men, he said: "I had no opportunity of seeing who were worthy, and I found the most unprincipled men the most useless and the most cowardly in this awful gale, and the men altogether the reverse, most brave and courageous."

Is profitable for doctrine for life. In the spring of the year 372 a young man, the thirty-first year of his age, a student of mind, entered his father's house near Milan. This was no other than the afterward eminent Augustine. Of his youth—a youth spent in study and impiety—weighed heavily on his mind. Lying under a fig-tree, moaning and weeping out abundant tears, he heard a neighboring house a young voice crying and repeating in rapid succession, "lege! tolle, lege!" (Take and read! and read!) Receiving this as a admonition, he returned to the place where he had left his friend Albius, and procured the roll of St. Paul's epistle which he had a short time before with him. "I seized the roll," said he, describing the scene; "I opened it in silence the chapter on which I first alighted." It was the third chapter of Romans: "Let us walk honestly, in day; not in rioting and drunkenness, in clambering and wantonness, not in envy and envious. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." It was decided by a word. Every doubt was banished. The morning star had appeared in his heart.

That the man of God may be profitable. The study of the Bible fits a man for the world. At one time the thought it necessary to have four teachers for their princes: The wisest man for wisdom; the bravest man to teach the most just to train the moral and most temperate to teach the soldiers. All these combined could not do for what would be done if he could be made the Bible his guide. I have every part of his nature in which is the best way to develop

"THE BETHESDA HOME."
rist-like Work Among the Unfortunin Brooklyn—The "Still Hour" at th Home—A Lost Daughter Restored.

MANY readers of this journal are already familiar with the history of the Bethesda Home in Brooklyn, and its work among the friendless and the fallen in that populous city, which is part of the metropolis itself. For years past, a number of our friends aided this work by their contributions and their prayers, and it is a pleasure to report that constant and unintermitted progress has been made. The Home is at No. 79 Fort Greene Place, a grand and respectable section of the city, and is doing a much needed and useful work. It is not only a Shelter and a Rescue home, but to some extent it is also an industrial training school, where the girls acquire such practical knowledge as to serve them in subsequent efforts to earn an honest and respectable living. Dressmaking and all sorts of needlework, laundry-work, cooking and the ordinary duties of domestic help are taught, and any girls who have been sent from the Home during the last few years are now supporting themselves creditably and leading blameless Christian lives.

There are not wanting evidences to show that the spiritual influences of the Bethesda Home extend far beyond its immediate boundaries. Not long ago a resident of a Western State, who had read of the Bethesda Home in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, wrote us inquiring if it were possible for the Home managers to seek out his lost daughter in New York. After the managers had visited a number of places they happened upon a noted resort where they found the girl upon the stage of a low class show. At first it was impossible to get her to listen at all to what they had to say; but finally they consented to let them take away the Bethesda her child, a little boy five years old. They sent the fellow by express to the wayward daughter's parents' home in the West. The girl said she had an engagement for two weeks longer, which she felt it in duty bound to keep, but on Monday she would go home to her parents also. While they were waiting for her, the ladies talked to another woman, and persuaded her also to consent to give up a sinful life. They procured suitable clothing for her and sent her to her home in Albany, N. Y., since which they have had some very promising letters from her. Another girl who was taken from the streets of New York, was converted while in the Home. She died in October last of consumption, a redeemed Christian woman.

During the past year the Bethesda Home has sheltered 158 women, and of these numbers the present whereabouts and condition of seven-eighths are known to the managers. One of the judges of a Brooklyn Court said of this class of women: "They come before me very often from the Bethesda Home gets hold of them and after that they come less and less and afterward cease coming altogether." This unsolicited testimony is significant as showing the reformatory influence of the Home among the class its work is intended to reach.

An illustration, taken during the "still hour" at the Home, when the matron summons the helpers and others for the Scripture-reading, affords an idea of the quiet, restful atmosphere that pervades the place—making it indeed a haven of rest and peace and security for the weary ones who seek temporary refuge there from the wickedness of the world and the miseries of the life they have been leading. Ordinarily, however, it is a scene of activity, and employment of some sort is never wanting for willing hands.

The Faith of a Child.

During the great storm which swept the Sea Island region, several years ago, the following incident occurred which is worth relating as showing the beautiful and heroic faith of a child:

When the waves arose and swept across the islands, and the water burst open the house-door and rushed in, bringing boards, ducks, geese, snakes and rubbish, a mother tied her baby on her shoulder and lifted her boy of six in her arms. To her fourteen-year-old daughter she said: "You must carry one child." "Which, mother?" said the girl.

The mother looked at the two, one of four years, one of two, unable to choose which to leave. Here Ben, her boy of eleven, a little Christian; yet full of fun and, I regularly visited the family. I tried to teach the girl to read, and for this purpose bought a kindergarten fan, with grooves for letters, and a cheap box of letters. The child learned to spell words with these letters. On calling one day, I found the little girl lying dead in bed, the tiny hands folded over her bosom, and between them the fan, with the letters inserted. "I lov Him," The mother told how when the child was dying, she had wished to spell a message for me, and had at first put "I lov u." The mother told her that I already knew that, and would be far more glad to know that she trusted in Jesus in the hour of her death. So the child changed the letters till they read "I lov Him."

"The mother begged me to keep the fan as a memento, but I refused, and tied a text to it with white ribbon. Whenever the man and woman go, the woman always hangs this up in her room, and both she and her husband have become sincere Christians."

Our Friend, the Horse.

Much interest has been awakened by the publication, from time to time, of letters in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, from readers who favored kinder treatment for the dumb animals. Mrs. O. H. Church, of Adrian, Mich., writes:

My heart is pained almost every day of my life, to see so much unkindness to poor animals. From my window, I saw two young men, passing with a load of dirt. The horse was doing its very best, while the young men were trotting along, one on

THE RIGHT WAY.

WHAT though my pilgrimage be over
 Barren deserts day by day;
 What though before me seem such trials
 As might fill with blank dismay,
 The blessed Holy Spirit leads me
 By the right way.

What though the road be hard and by it,
 Demons crouch like beasts of prey;
 What though the way be dark and dreary;
 Skies no guiding star display:
 I know my Heavenly Father leadeth
 By the right way.

O, Father, from the path thou markest
 I would never, never stray.
 Whatever be thy marching orders
 I would never disobey.

O, God, I trust and know thou leadest
 By the right way.

SYMPATHY WITH THE CHILDREN.

ARE any of us missing to-day golden opportunities to bind our children to us by the mighty bands of sympathy? Sympathy means so much to a child—and how quickly does a child learn who are his sympathizers! They only are the ones who can lead him to the right—yes or to the wrong. The sympathy we give our little ones now will measure the strength of our influence with them when they are older and less dependent upon us. If we would have their confidence and so be able to help them by and by, let us not fail to sow the seed of the harvest we would reap. I suspect many a mother has lost her influence over her boy and mourned his waywardness more because she had failed to take an interest in his base-ball or his bugs and beetles, than because she did not give him proper teaching. And I suspect that many a girl has gone wrong who would not have done so if her mother had thought it worth while to admire her childish gift of dandelions or clover, and to heartily thank her for them. Then when she was older, her mother ridiculed her girlish fancy for some innocent school-boy friend and unsympathetically told her she was altogether too young to be thinking of the attention of young men. Perhaps she was, but O, there are ways and ways of doing the same thing, and above all, mothers should be tenderly careful lest their lack of sympathy should repel the confidence of children. And not only should we encourage them to confide in us, but let us also confide in them, and let nothing that interests them be too insignificant to enlist our enthusiasm. Let us read with them, help them make puzzles, tell them stories. Let us join them in croquet or parchesi, and love their dear little white rabbits, their butterflies and toads if only because they do. O let us hold them fast—these darlings of ours: let us forge the strong chains of love, not that we may keep our children always with us—we cannot do that, but that if only for the love they bear us, they shall not drift from the moorings of righteousness.

The years are passing. Let each one make us nearer and dearer to the hearts of our children. Let us bless them while we may. Let us point them, train them, lead them, love them into the Kingdom of God and Heaven.

Vineland, N. J. MRS. FRANK A. BRECK.

A Mother's Burden.

Many a mother bears in her own heart such a burden of care and affliction as the outside world can never know. One of those patient ones, writing us from Virginia, says: "My young son is almost entirely helpless. He is a dear, patient, good boy, has been afflicted all his life." Yet this invalid lad, who is denied nearly all the delights that make youth dear to the heart of a boy: who cannot romp, or play, or saunter through the woods; who knows nothing of the big, busy, selfish world outside his quiet sick-room, has at heart a secret happiness the world cannot give. Tended by loving, praying Christian parents, who are watchful of his every interest, it is not surprising that the young invalid's spiritual nature should have developed. It hardly needs a formal profession to declare that some pure hearts belong to Jesus, the fact is so clearly evident. The sympathy of other parents will go out to this poor, pale mother, worn with labor and watching beside her invalid boy and frolic as a boy can well be, said: "Ma, I'll take the little one." "No, my boy, you can't; you can't save yourself, let alone the child." "I know I can't," answered Ben, "but Christ can." "The water is too deep; its up to your shoulders now," said the despairing mother. With a smile that gave her courage, the boy swung the little one upon his shoulder. "It's deep for true, but Christ is a tall man. He must be." So they started. The anxious mother kept calling to her children through the roar of the wind and water. The daughter kept up with her, but very soon Ben ceased to answer. When at length they reached the rising ground, she met her brother trying to force his horse through the water to her aid. He took her to his own home, but of Ben there was no trace.

When the tide went down the next morning, and she sat grieving for her lost children, little Ben tramped into the house, saying: "Didn't I tell you true, mamma?" He put his little charge into his mother's arms.

A Last Message of Love.

This beautiful incident is related by an English lady, deaconess in Wesleyan Institute, at Leicester. In the course of her missionary work, she visited a low lodging house where a man, his wife and dying daughter, dwelt. "The man signed the pledge and prayed God to help him keep each side, urging it on at a much faster gait than was good for it. I watched the proceedings until the horse suddenly came to a halt. Then rough words and heavy blows came thick and fast. I was indignant, if not angry, and resolved something must be done, and that quickly, so putting on my hat, I went out of the yard and up the street. When I got opposite the men and horse, I stopped and asked what the trouble was. The men replied that the horse was balky and would not go. I told them if it was balky I did not think it would do any good to pound it, and that it was cruel to do so. I looked at the horse and the load, and told them the horse was small and weak, and the load too heavy for it. I patted the poor creature, and told them if they would let the horse rest a few minutes and be gentle with it, they would not have any trouble. One of the men was for knocking the poor beast down with a club; the other listened respectfully and walked slowly on as though going to a neighbor's, keeping both ears open the while; but I heard no more blows. Soon, I heard them coming, and looking back, I noticed the horse was going well. As they came up, I said to the young man driving, that the horse seemed to be doing nicely. He replied, "Yes, and hereafter I will take your advice." I felt amply rewarded, for I had not only done the horse a good turn, but the young men good also. I wish the laws were more strictly enforced in regard to these matters.

Mrs. W. T. Wisner, Brooks' Grove, N. Y., writes on the same subject:

I have never known true prosperity to attend the man who ill-treats his animals. I think the time has come when the press should devote more time and space to this urgent course, and that we should not only generalize, but enter into particulars. Surely, the God who assures us that not even a sparrow falls to the ground without his notice, will reward or punish us according as we heed his precept: "Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father also is merciful." I can but wonder that so much cruelty and suffering should go apparently unnoticed by men, and that it is left mostly to women to plead the cause of our dumb friends.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

The Church of the Future.

BY AMELIA E. BARR.

STEVE waited for his friend. He was quieter than usual, but trembling with feeling. "John! Dear John!" he said, "You have done me good. Come home with me. I have much to say to you."

"I will. How is Jessie?"

"She is in Newport. I believe she is well."

"You did not go to Lloyd Park this year?"

"No. The place is virtually shut up. Jessie preferred Newport. I shall go there also in a few days. John you have made me tremble to-night. Tell me what I ought to do with all this money that I can neither refuse, nor yet I fear use properly. It is a great burden. What shall I do with it?"

"Open up the King's Highway! Prepare it for the coming of the Lord! Apolyn has indeed straddled over the whole width of it, and under his evil wings drunkards, thieves and oppressors of every kind find shelter. The poor are tormented, the broken in heart terrified, the sick and suffering can hardly find their way to the grave. Go out like another Goliath; feed the hungry, clothe the naked, comfort the sorrowful. Steve! Steve! there are such great opportunities before you! I am terrified lest you neglect them. What is it to be? Are you going to prepare golden futures of love and work? Or must life go by fruitless, and you not dare to search your will and your heart till at the last hour the past shall clang and flash for you as for a drowning man?"

"I hope not, John! I can see there is much to be done, and I can feel that I am not the man to do much. The very magnitude of the work oppresses me and makes me hopeless."

"With the magnitude of the work you have nothing to do Steve. 'It is not incumbent on us to complete the work, but not therefore must we cease from it,' that is from the Talmud—but it is good Christianity. And why should you fear? The light is on your face, and the shadows all behind your back."

Steve sighed, but he went into his house grasping John's hand, and he was strengthened by its touch, and his heart was full of a great purpose.

CHAPTER XIII.
Clear the King's Highway.

The two men went straight to Steve's private room. The windows were open and the light and stir of the avenue entered through them. They sat down without turning on the gas; the dim reflection from the street-lamps was sufficient for their conversation. Steve was pressed by his emotions and opened the conversation with eagerness, even as they drew their chairs to the window.

"I want to give a million dollars away, John," he said. "How shall I do it wisely?"

"You mean that you want to give it for the purposes of charity?"

"Yes. That is what I mean. It is only right and just that I should do so, besides it fits all my noblest inclinations."

"It is also wise, Steve. Charity is the salt of riches, it preserves them. Riches have wings, but Charity clips them. I am glad that it is both your duty and your pleasure, to remember those ready to perish."

"But I cannot disburse such a sum personally," said Steve. "Even if it were possible, I should make a great bungle of it, for if I ever attempt to give a dollar, I have to give another dollar, and I am at my wit's end as to what I ought to do."

"Very few men know how to give, Steve," answered John, "and for such, vicarious charity is not only all, but it is also the best they can do. Charity, however, is not a matter of accident or of feeling. It is not casual. It is an habitual well doing which will work out its own channels, and not be diverted from them."

"We must find out together, John, some great co-operative ways and facilities for doing good."

"We have already a great many charitable societies, Steve, with which you are more or less acquainted. And then there is the McAuley Mission, and the Cremorne Mission, and the Florence Mission, and that wonderful Bowery Mission for men, that you and I stepped into accidentally one night. I say 'accidentally,' Steve, because what we call 'accident' is Providence, and is usually God's part in any event. Do you remember?"

"I am not likely ever to forget those four hundred poor fellows. What pathetic experiences of temptation and fall, and repentance they told! I knew only too well how true they were; I, myself, had been in similar straits. Oh, John, what can we do to help such weak, unhappy, struggling men?"

"We can strengthen the hands of those already familiar with the work. You cannot personally go down among them, and see that they are fed, and washed, and clothed, and work found for their hands, and comfort for their hearts, and divine instruction for their souls. But you can give the wherewithal to provide these necessities. Give them a substantial lift to start with. They want a chapel, they want a reading-room, they want better dormitories and baths; oh, they want so many things! You can increase their comforts and their usefulness on every side. How many hundreds are, at this moment, wandering in the darkness and despair of this great city, that could be saved and blessed if there was room to take them in, and money to provide for their urgent necessities!"

"John, these worthy charities for men shall have their aid in good season. We will see about it to-morrow morning, as soon as possible. Oh, my heart goes out to every man, without love and home, in the outer darkness of these stony streets! How easy it is for them to do wrong! How hard to do right!"

"With all my heart I will go with you. Have you no special idea with regard to spending so much money. You have been much and familiarly among the poor; you have seen and tasted their life in its bitterness; is there then from your own experience no special light on the subject?"

"Yes, John. I will tell you a charity greatly needed—it is a Transportation Fund for working mechanics and laborers."

"I don't understand, Steve."

"I will explain. When I was last in Chicago there were hundreds of bricklayers, stonemasons and plasterers out of work. Nothing to do in Chicago, and yet plenty to do in New York. But they could not get to New York. They had not the money. This is but one small example of a condition constantly occurring. Now then, what is needed is a fund for transporting sober, bona-fide workers of suffering children! I want to send you a Teething Necklace absolutely free.

From the fifth month to the third year (the teething period) is the critical time in human life. The entire infant organization then undergoes a change, and serious maladies arise.

In a robust child, teething often proceeds favorably; the weak and delicate child becomes feverish and restless. The tooth penetrates the gum with difficulty. Serious complications occur, accompanied by intense pain, swelling of the gums; the bowels are disordered, and inflammation of the brain and convulsions follow, terminating too frequently in painful death.

Mrs. H. S. HILTON writes:
Indianapolis, January 18, 1897.
Mr. H. C. Blair.
Dear Sir:—In April my twin babies, born in September, began teething. It was very warm here. They began to have bowel disturbance at once. One baby drooped more and more, till the 15th of June he came down with cholera infantum and died the 27th. During his illness the other baby sickened, following fast with all symptoms. His life was despaired of, and hung for months in the balance, when we sent for your necklace—willing, of course, to snatch at a straw to help the baby. He has been free from bowel trouble ever since; cut a double tooth at Christmas and another a week later. The tooth gave him fever for a few days, but no bowel trouble.
The baby has been better, slept better, howls better, and has gained in flesh since he wore it.
Respectfully yours,
MRS. H. S. HILTON.

I don't know why electricity goes through iron and stops at steel. I don't know just why DR. JUERGENSEN'S ELECTROMOTIC TEETHING NECKLACE allays the ills incident to the teething period in children, but I do know that it does. I have manufactured and sold many thousands of these necklaces, offering in all cases to refund the money to any dissatisfied purchaser and the first one has yet to claim the money.

When a child shows the first symptoms of teething, one of the ELECTROMOTIC NECKLACES should be tied around its neck and worn constantly. The beneficial effect of the necklace will be at once exerted upon the growing teeth, and upon the arteries and nerves. The gum will be penetrated by the tooth without difficulty, and the child spared from suffering. Give a baby internal remedies unless prescribed by a physician.

I believe American mothers are honest, and I am willing to trust them, hence this

ABSOLUTELY FREE TRIAL OFFER:
If your baby is ailing, send me your name and address, and will mail a necklace to you at once. At the end of thirty days time I will send you a bill for 50 cents, which you can either pay or return the necklace. If you are not satisfied with it, I do not want your money.

kinds, from place to place, as the exigencies of labor demand them. I think it would be better to send them to work is than to open soup kitchens, and let them eat out of bread to enforced idleness. It would be much better and much more honorable and just. It would be for the workers good, with their own hands which is God's way of helping. There would doubtless be cases in which it would be proper also to send the family to the father of it, but this and other exigencies must be well considered and provided for. Your idea, however, is a very good one Steve, and the help it promises much needed."

"Will then the Transportation Fund is the end object. What is the next?"

"I heard the other day of a proposal to settle a little isle washed by the ocean, and make it a sunshine land for the poor people children who have never, in all their lives, known a day's pleasure, never had by childhood, never had any playthings, never tasted the sweets which are as necessary as food to their young frames, never known what love and singing, and singing, and praying, and good, and nice eating, and kind words might mean. To give these wronged, poor babies a chance for a little happiness to put them on the right road, to go as far as possible—that they keep to the path which believe in God's love, because they feel man's love and believe in the happiness of heaven because they have tasted happiness on earth—"

"O John! John! This is best of all! I believe in the children most of all. You are a great deal with a child, a great deal with a boy that you can't do with a man, a great deal with a girl that you can't do with a woman."

"It is true; so, then, the children must have a wide and gracious showing, it is so hard and grim that if we take away from the children out of it we shall almost believe that joy is dead. What shall we do?"

"I have had one other dream for humanity. I would like to make come true—but it is ever so small a respect. When I wandered about the Great Western wilderness, in which no man stays, I wondered and wondered at their lovely solitudes, at whenever I came back to this crowded with humanity, I wondered and wondered more and I was haunted by four days and night, and set my footsteps there, and let the problem they involved be a helplessly hither and thither: the soil lies fallow, the woods grow rank, and the idle poor man stands; millions of hands want acres, and millions of acres want hands!"

"Something can surely be done to bring these two 'wants' together, John!"

"Cainly, Steve." We shall have to have legislation perhaps, and delay will be necessary in order to be sure we are right, and doing right, but the project is highly possible. Suppose we plant a hundred homes in these fertile wilds of the West, how many homes would you have from the hundred? Enough in a generation or two to make the desolate place wave with golden wheat, and blossom like the rose. And though men and women would bring their sins and sorrows to these innocent places, they would also bring the music of psalm and song, and the exploration and joy of prayer and praise. We must then have a Land Fund as well as a Transportation Fund. But have you not some favorite object of kindness, some peculiar good that you would like to do, just because it would give us a heart a real, personal pleasure?"

"I have, John. I have an object which had my full consideration and my whole heart when I had not a dollar to give it, and never expected to have a dollar. I want to give one hundred thousand dollars—perhaps more—to increase, if possible, legislation for the protection of animals."

"Legislation—for animals?"

"Yes, for I have discovered that it is impossible to make the popular mind connect guilt with things the law does not punish."

"But for animals?"

"Yes, and a hundred times, yes!"

"Animals!—when there are men, woman and children?"

"Yes, and a hundred times, yes!"

"The beasts that perish—"

"Do they perish? Dare you affirm it?"

The Mississippi Floods.

Within the last two weeks, there has been a great improvement in the condition of affairs in the lately flooded Mississippi Valley. Mr. John Fritz, of Fritz's Landing, Ark., writes us that the farmers are now ploughing, and planting cotton and corn, and the suffering in that section at least, has wholly disappeared. Mr. A. M. Middlebrook, Sunday School missionary, Pine Bluff, Ark., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Please accept sincere thanks for your action in sending the Welcome down the river to take my people out of the flooded district of the Mississippi bottom. I thank you in behalf of the colored people of Arkansas. The writer is one of the old subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and is the State Sunday School Missionary for the colored people. We have at least 300,000 people to preach to, teach and supply with religious literature, tracts and Bibles. We sometimes get boxes of small Bibles and books from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and they do great good.

Letters from other sections visited by the relief tug during her recent trip down the river also indicate a cessation of the suffering and a brighter condition of affairs generally.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV. LOUIS A. BANKS, D.D.

The Last of the Hutchinsons.

OF all that heroic group in which Phillips and Lovejoy and Garrison and Whittier, and many others were shining stars, there was no more unique inner circle than what was known as "The Hutchinson Family." They were not orators, but they were sweet singers who were able to send the Gospel of liberty into many a heart that was locked and barred against the most persuasive key of public speech.

Mr. John Wallace Hutchinson, the last left on earth of that truly brave and picturesque group, has recently published through Lee & Shepard, of Boston, a marvelously interesting "Story of the Hutchinsons." It is as full of fascinating reminiscences of a brave and romantic time as an egg is full of meat.

Mr. Hutchinson tells a very interesting story of Henry Clay. It was in the year 1848, and "the Hutchinsons" were in New York giving concerts. Jesse, one of the brothers, wrote a new song of Mr. Clay, entitled "Harry of the West," and the present survivor wrote the music for it. This song was prepared on their way to New York, and was first sung on the boat between New Haven and the latter city. While in New York they were invited by

Strange New Shrub that Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc., Free.

We have previously described the new botanic discovery, Alkavis, which proves a specific cure for diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disorder of the kidneys or urinary organs. It is now stated that Alkavis is a product of the well known Kava-Kava Shrub, and is a specific cure for these diseases just as quinine is for malaria. Hon. R. C. Wood, of Lowell, Ind., writes that in four weeks Alkavis cured him of Kidney and bladder disease of ten years' standing, and Rev. Thomas M. Owen, of West Pawlet, Vt., gives similar testimony. Many ladies also testify to its wonderful curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. The only importers of Alkavis so far are the Church Kidney Cure Co., of 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative power.

Captain Knight, of the then new and famous ship, Henry Clay, to go on board his vessel. Complying, they went into the Captain's cabin, and standing in a group, they struck up their new song. They had hardly finished, when an alderman of the city, who was on board said to them enthusiastically: "You must go and sing that song to Henry Clay this afternoon."

Going ashore they soon arrived at the hotel where a great reception was taking place. The Mayor with his chief councillors, and their distinguished guest were just about taking their wine at the banquet, when the singers were ushered in. The Mayor at once arose, announcing their presence, and asked them to sing an appropriate selection. The four brothers sang:

Come, brothers, now let's hurry out
To see our honored guest.
For lo, in every street they shout,
"Brave Harry of the West."

For, th' glorious day is coming near
When wrong shall be redressed,
And freedom's star shine bright and clear
On "Harry of the West."

Then, hail, all hail, thrice honored sage,
Our most distinguished guest!
We'll venerate thy good old age,
Brave "Harry of the West."

While they were singing this song, Mr. Clay's eyes opened, and his chin dropped with astonishment and surprise. At the close he arose and came to them saying: "What can I do to repay you for this great honor you have conferred upon me?" Subsequently he sent his wine down to them, but the brave young Hutchinsons sent him back word that they were teetotalers, and could not drink with him. It took a good deal more courage to do that in 1848 than it would now. On receiving their reply, Henry Clay arose from the table, for the second time, and leaving the circle of politicians about him, walked across the room, the observed of all observers, and said to the young singers: "If I were a young man like yourselves, I'd be a teetotaler too."

John Wallace Hutchinson has remained faithful to his temperance principles through all the years, and his handsome head, as splendid as Nathaniel Hawthorne's, often graces the platform of a temperance meeting.

The number of Asthma and Hay Fever patients under our care each season exceeds four thousand.

We treat patients in all parts of the United States and England—in fact anywhere that the mails go—treating each patient individually.

By a system of careful reports weekly we guide and direct patients how to secure the best results.

In 1884 we treated 300 patients. Up to 1897 we treated over 37,000—the natural growth of a successful practice.

Probably nine-tenths of our patients come to us through personal recommendation from other patients.

Temporary relief may sometimes be had by changing climate, but for a permanent cure constitutional treatment is necessary.

The cause of Hay-Fever and Asthma is not external but internal—it is in the blood and nervous system of the sufferer.

Our constitutional treatment not only gives relief, but eradicates the cause of the disease and cures to stay cured.

Home Talks with Mothers and Daughters.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Children and the Lord's Day.

THE Lord's day! Are we losing the sense that one day in seven belongs to Jehovah, who gives us six days for our own work, our own play, our own uses, but reserves the seventh for the refreshing of our souls and bodies and for his worship? "Remember the Sabbath to keep it holy," was the divine command which made provision for the rest, so, until time shall end, we may have cessation from care and rest from our blessed hours come round. In America we have great occasion to value our Sabbaths from the invasion of foreign ideas, in direct antagonism to the spirit of our country, and the principles of our fathers. We need, too, to stand on our right to a Sabbath in our midst, and to train our little ones in reverence for the Lord's own day is at our duty and our privilege. Dear friends, in doing this we should be careful that we do not make the child the Sabbath by burdensome restrictions which are of our own invention in disobedience of God's ordering. Restless hands and feet must have occupation on Sunday as on Monday. Awake childish brains seek food for the soul on Sunday as on Monday. We must make a difference between that which is secular and that which is sacred, and the sacred hours may be full of agreeable occupations, which are in no sense less dear to the children than the day itself. The dear children may grow up to love Sunday as the cap-sheaf and the best day of the week. It means let them be taken at any time to church. There is no sweeter sight to the world than a row of golden heads in the pew.

Think that our tender Saviour, whose mercies are ever new, as a special benediction for dear little heads in the pew. A prudent mother will not expect her children and lassies to attend strictly to sermon, and will provide them with a book, or a pad and pencil, or allow them to cuddle down into her lap, and let them sit at a nap, when the good pastor explains the doctrines to his children. If they go regularly and steadily to church, they will after awhile form the habit of listening to the discourse, and it will be by degrees assimilated. Remember to this day a sermon which I heard a gray-haired minister preach, when a little girl of possibly eight summers said the text was, "And pray ye that ye may not be in the winter." Tell the children to sit still and not to fidget, or they must not disturb others in the sanctuary. Teach them also the regular business of Sunday morning, going to church, and that nobody is excused from this, unless he or she is ill. As families we should seek the presence of the Lord on the Lord's day. Sunday School, as a matter of course, the children will love and enjoy. But they have had the pleasant hour with their teacher, the hymns, the full enjoyment of the happy time, (and few happy times come to children than those they have in a well-conducted Sunday school, when this is over and they are again at home, the mother's problem is to do to make the afternoon both profitable and pleasant. There drifted to me one day last winter, a beautiful little booklet on this theme, a mother's book for other mothers. The title "How to make Sabbath Afternoons Profitable and Pleasant to Children," attracted me at once, and I read the pages with great interest, noting that the writer, Mrs. F. A.

Welcher, of Newark, Wayne County, N.Y., had evidently a great love of children, and a real sympathy with them, and comprehension of their needs. Mrs. Welcher indicates a variety of ways in which children can be entertained, amused and employed on the Sabbath, none of them ways objectionable or alien to the spirit of the day. A mother reading this will have suggestions made to her which she can follow out and further amplify. She will be able to show her little ones that

A Sabbath well spent Means a week of content.

I wish I could persuade you all to end the hallowed day with home song. An hour of hymns, father, mother and children joining, is a sweet and precious thing at the close of the Sabbath. Even those of the family who are not in full sympathy with the religious life, if any such there be are unconsciously drawn into the tide of song. They join in "Blest be the Tie that Binds," and "Jesus, I my Cross have Taken," and "Sun of my Soul, thou Saviour Dear," and "A Charge to Keep I Have," and "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," and on the wings of those glorious songs of God's Church militant, they are wafted towards the glories of the Church triumphant. Do not fall into the error of thinking that a juvenile observance of the Sabbath, along strict old-fashioned lines will keep any grown person from Sabbath-keeping.

On Sunday afternoons let us as families read again the dear familiar Bible stories, on which whole generations of God's dear people have thriven. How beautiful they are, these old stories in Genesis and Numbers and Joshua, in Kings and Chronicles. Forever new, each time we read them, they shine upon us, star-like and serene, and their characters are more vividly outlined and more interesting than any which we can find in pages of modern romance.

Let us cherish God's day.
Sweet day that comes from the heavenly land,
Ever bringing a gift in its hand.
Ever pouring above our life
Some of the peace with which heaven is rife.
Lifting a face serene and fair
Over our discontent and care.
Giving us something of Christ, to bless
Even in moments of sore distress.
Day of the Lord, to mortals given
Straight from the innermost heart of heaven!
Dearly we prize its hallowed calm,
Clearly we lift a joyful psalm.
For the Lord who loves and bought us, sent
This beautiful day, to be ever blest
With tenderest thoughts of the infinite love
That forever is brooding our lives above.

Friends, let us cling to the Sabbath! Let us honor the Lord of the Sabbath! So shall we and our children, and theirs, keep to all time, our goodly heritage in this free land.

THE ABSORPTION TREATMENT.

"A Heaven Sent Blessing."

No Waiting to be Blind; No Knife, No Risk.

THE NEW YORK OBSERVER says: "Among the grateful patients we find the Rev. B. N. Palmer, D. D., of New Orleans, La., well known to our readers. Dr. Palmer, some two years ago, noticed his eyesight failing, and consulted Dr. Knapp, of New York, and Dr. Pope, of New Orleans, who diagnosed the case as atrophy. After being under treatment for one year they pronounced his case hopeless, and further treatment was abandoned. On July 24, 1896, one eye being nearly sightless and the other failing, he consulted E. H. Bemis, Eye Specialist, of the Glens Falls, N. Y., Sanitarium, remarking that he had 'nothing to lose and a great deal to gain,' as cataracts were forming which would make blindness sure, and the little sight left was only available with the aid of a strong magnifying glass. On September 7, six weeks after commencing the absorption treatment, the strong lens had been laid aside, and the glasses, discarded years ago, now enable him to read again, to the great surprise of himself and friends."

Dr. PALMER says: "His theory is rational, based upon the self-restoring power of Nature herself. Medicine cures only by rousing a peccant organ to the performance of its duty, when disease is thrown off and the patient recovers. The eye, he thinks, should form no exception. His aim, therefore, is to stimulate the eye, promote its secretions and increase the circulation, thus REVITALIZING the eye and enabling it to fulfill its functions. IT THROWS OFF ALL THE TROUBLES AND REPAIRS ITS OWN WASTE. His method is simple, safe and in no way unpleasant."

A. B. COLVIN, State Treasurer of New York and a resident of Glens Falls, writes: "The history of the Bemis Sanitarium and its advance by marvelous strides is due to Edward H. Bemis, Eye Specialist, whose marvelous success makes his name familiar to thousands all over the United States and in many foreign lands, and God speed him."

SYRIAN PEASANT HOMES.

Homes of To-day but Little Changed from the Homes of Twenty Centuries Ago—The Dull Monotony of the Lives of Syrian Women.

It has been well said by some one who has travelled much in Syria and lived among its people, that there are usually only three events that break the dreary monotony of a Syrian peasant woman's life: a birth, a betrothal or wedding, a funeral. Married at an early age, earthen floor, it is not a domicile to invite the fastidious. But it serves its purpose and seems to suit its mistress admirably. With her water-pitcher, a little heap of dried lentils, an economical supply of flour and oil, strings of onions and peppers, some rice, a half-dozen or more odd-looking cooking utensils, a kneading-board for bread-making, and a little fire of sticks, the household; their parents and grandparents lived and fared just as they do, and they cannot comprehend why they should be dissatisfied with their lot. When one looks upon their quiet, restful faces, untroubled by the vanities and temptations that beset those who know more of the world and have a wider share in its pleasures and disappointments, it is not difficult to believe them really content. They form a part of the old, simple, unprogressive Orient, which in many respects may be said to have stood still while centuries have passed, and while the rest of the world has been steadily marching forward play is common to both Moslem and Christian Syrians. The peasant housewife, who knows nothing of styles or fashion, but is content to make her clothes after the ancient pattern followed by her ancestors, often wears a cheap calico gown of a clumsy make. But whether rich or poor she never omits to wear her veil—the traditional custom of the women of her race—when she goes to market or to visit a neighbor. If she be a married woman, the veil is of dark material, and if a young girl, it is white and may be silk or calico, according to the social position of the wearer.

her is ordinarily one of unrelieved monotony, without promise of betterment. The world is comprised within the walls of the rude stone dwelling she calls home—a structure which may have served several preceding generations. Houses, such as that shown in our colored illustration, are common throughout Syria. Constructed of roughly dressed limestone, and of sun-dried clay, in a manner that gives assurance of strength, but betrays little acquaintance with the canons of architectural taste; unlighted, save for one or two tiny windows, and with a musty housewife considers herself fairly well equipped for emergencies. Many are excellent cooks, and with the simplest material can turn out dishes that are both appetizing and nutritious.

Housewives like the women seen in the photograph are fair types of thousands to be found in the small villages and hamlets of the Holy Land. They are hard workers, leading very simple and frugal lives, with very little of sunshine to cheer them on the way; yet they are measurably contented with their lot. Ambition can hardly be said to exist in a Syrian peasant to new destinies and broader achievement. As already stated, one of the great events in a Syrian household, is the wedding of a son or daughter. No matter whether the bride's family be rich or poor, her relatives unite in the effort to make her appear specially desirable to the young man's family, and her own parents, often as the result of much sacrifice and privation, deck her with such coins and jewelry on arms, neck and head dress as they can give, these being regarded as a bride's personal property which even a husband cannot take from her. This dis-

In the larger cities, the lot of the Syrian women of the peasant class is somewhat less hard than that of their sisters in the country villages. Their lives are not quite so laborious, and they come in contact with the uplifting influence of Christian churches and the teaching of godly missionaries. In recent years, much excellent educational and practical training work has been done among the younger Syrian women and girls, and the result has been a marked, though yet only a partial, awakening of spiritual and intellectual life among the Syrian women.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

W. H. V., Capron, Va. Is it practical or likely to produce good results for children to attend two Sabbath Schools of different denominations the same day? 2. Is it right to teach our church doctrines in Sunday School? 3. What Scriptures have we that teaches us that we can know in this world that we are saved?

1. Such a course is inadvisable and not likely to be profitable in any sense. It would overburden and confuse the child. 2. Certainly. 3. See Romans 8:1 to 16; 1 John 3:14; 1 John 5:10, 13, 14.

J. M. S., Monticello, Cal. A friend who believes he has been converted and who professes to be trying to lead a Christian life refuses to attend church, and cannot be prevailed upon to go. Do you think he has really been converted or is he deceiving himself?

He may have reasons that you do not state for not attending, but they should be very good ones. "Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together" is a Scriptural injunction. We can imagine circumstances in which a man may lead a Christian life without attending church, as in cases of illness or residence far away from a church, but to be near one and able to go and yet not to go is strange conduct for a Christian. Conversion usually brings with it love of the brethren and joy in associating with them and delight in joining in praise and prayer. To wilfully stay away is to deprive the soul of one of the most important and helpful means of development. While we shrink from judging any man we should have grave doubts as to the reality of the conversion of any man who did not show his Christianity by attending public worship.

F. H., Hayfield, Manitoba. 1. Was it necessary for the Jews to crucify our Lord in order to fulfil prophecy? If so, why are they blamed? 2. How came priests and scribes who studied the Old Testament to be so mistaken in not recognizing Christ?

1. A prophecy does not compel obedience. A man may know B's character so well that he can predict confidently how B would act in given circumstances; but B would be responsible for his conduct. The leaders of the Jewish race had become so worldly and unscrupulous, as was shown in many ways, such as permitting traffic in the Temple courts (see Matt. 21:12), that they would not hesitate to put to death any one of whom they were jealous. The question of how salvation would have come to us if Christ had not been crucified is not important. If the Jews had accepted him, he would have been able to execute his mission of revealing God to man. 2. They were mistaken because they looked for a King, and were prejudiced against him because of his humility and his lowly birth.

John B., Correctionville, Ia., writes:

My reference to your article on "Poorly-fed Ministers," has called forth much comment. It has shown what a wide circulation THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has and that the subject is a live one. I want to cast no reflection on the ministers, for they are certainly poorly paid compared to some people's income; but comparing their income with that of the farmer, it will average greater; and if some body will tell us farmers how to get a better income instead of aousing us, the preacher might fare better. I believe the farmers give as a rule all they can afford. For one have always been ready to duplicate any man's offering who shared equally with me the advantages of our high state of civilization. How farmers do have to save to educate their children those of other professions have but little knowledge of. Now I am not whining or finding fault, I do thank God that he has given me strength to run a farm. But I shall protest as long as he gives me breath, that the farmers are not paying the preacher as paying $200 or $300. Strangely that God expects more of man than he does of God. God pays the farmer, but the farmer pays every body.

Jessie I., Montpelier, Vt. 1. What is the story of "The Brides of Venice"? 2. How did "bride's cake" originate?

1. It was an old custom in Venice for twelve maidens of humble family to be endowed by the State and wedded at a certain annual festival to their betrothed lovers. During the reign of Pietro Samedio II, a fleet of pirates entered port as one of these wedding processions was in progress, abducted the brides and set sail with them. The Doge's vessel followed, overtook and slew the freebooters and restored the maidens to their friends. For many years a procession in honor of the event was held on the anniversary of the abduction. 2. It was a custom in ancient Rome for the newly wedded pair to eat together, this being called "marriage by confarreatio," and at such weddings, offerings of a sweet cake and also of meat were made to the heathen gods. The cake, according to some writers, was made by the bridesmaids and carried before the bride when she was conducted to her husband's dwelling. It is not at all certain, however, that the custom originated in Rome as traces of a similar ancient practice have been found in India, in the South Sea Islands, in Sweden, in ancient Britain and among the Indians of North America.

Subscriber, Winchester, No. Dakota. 1. Did the Apostle Peter ever visit Rome, and if so, was he beheaded in that city? 2. Was Paul executed in Rome?

1. There has been much controversy upon the question of Peter's connection with Rome, and the stories concerning his work there are largely traditional. Although there is no absolute evidence that he visited that city, it is generally believed that he must have done so, probably during the last year of his life. Eusebius and Jerome both say Peter was at Rome.

he should do ill. It must be a satisfaction to the man even if his own soul is lost, that he helped forward the work by which others were saved. We do not think the Church should accept the proceeds of crime or immorality, but we do not see any ground for requiring a donor to prove that he is a Christian before accepting his gift.

One in Sorrow. 1. Is there any comfort for one who on the sudden death of a loved one, realizes, to his dismay and intense grief, that he has neglected that loved one; doing and saying little to add to his comfort or happiness, not even praying for him as he should have done, and yet loving him dearly all the time, and learning afterwards through a mutual friend that the neglected one always excused his friend's apparent coolness, trusting his love for him to the last? 2. Do our loved ones who are saved really see and know us here? Are they sent to earth on errands of mercy and love?

1. Such an experience is, unfortunately, by no means a rare one. We are apt to hide our real feelings and to repress, till too late, the love our hearts long to give to our dear ones. There is much unuttered love, the telling of which would make life sweeter and better. While sorrow in such a case is unavailing, it may be turned into a blessing if it makes us kinder and more thoughtful for others. In the next life we may be able to give free expression to the love that was unspoken here. 2. See Heb. 12:1; Heb. 1:14.

A game of chess furnishes so much pleasure with just the kind of occupation they need. 2. It is wrong to read some novels because they have a pernicious effect. There are, however, other novels which are good and helpful. Christ himself did not disdain the use of a chess-board, as witness his parable of a man chose to observe a chess-board which there were no religious vices and simply as a capital for the sake of being correct. It would make a difference. I believe that in observing Sunday please him because it is the honor of his Son, and to celebrate the event which secures promise of salvation. But of it as the Sabbath is no command. We do not spend it in the service of Christ.

J. E. W., Toronto, Ont. What is meant by the words "the strength of sin is the law" (1 Cor. 15:56)?

Paul is looking at sin in its legal aspect. The guilt of a sinner might be doubtful if there were no law. He might be doing wrong without clearly perceiving that it was wrong. But when the law is given and he knows of it, then if he transgresses, his guilt is so much the worse. It is fixed upon him and he has no excuse. The law brings the thing home to him and holds him strictly to account. In this way law is the strength of sin.

W. D. R., Nepessta, Colo. If good works done by worldly people are not acceptable to God, why do churches take money from them for the support of their work?

Who told you that good works done by worldly people are not acceptable to God? You may be sure that God is pleased with a good work, no matter by whom it is done. If you mean that worldly people cannot get to heaven by good works and that God will not reward them for doing them, you are right. A man who rejects Christ puts himself outside any hope of reward, because he insults God in despising the way of salvation God has provided. Good works cannot counterbalance such conduct. But even in that case it is better that the man should do good than that

OVER 40,000 LAMBS GATHERED IN.

The result of Eighteen Years' Missionary and Evangelical Effort of Our Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest—An Interesting Letter.

FOR nearly two decades Rev. George W. Sharp has been a missionary worker of the American Sunday School Union in the West and Southwest. For the last six years he has acted as special missionary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the West, and his labors have resulted in the opening up to Gospel influence of many sections where church privileges and Sunday Schools had till then been practically unknown. He writes of the extreme modesty of his own experience as one who does not "vaunt himself" and whose life and energies have been consecrated to the extension of Christ's kingdom without thought of reward. We give below some interesting passages from a recent letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

What follows is a careful estimate, taken from my official records and reports of results during eighteen years and months of missionary labor in north Dakota and elsewhere:

Number of schools organized, addressed, or otherwise aided.....	701
Working teachers.....	4,684
Scholars.....	40,203
Teachers and scholars.....	44,887

It was impossible to ascertain the growth of all the schools in so large a field, but it is reasonable to hope that the whole attendance has been as much as more than 50,000 teachers and scholars. Bibles and Testaments distributed 3,073; (which do not include the ones distributed from other places in my field more convenient to them than my office); visits to families 8,038, many of which besides family prayer, vigils, mornings, and on other occasions when suitable, the Scriptures were expounded, especially those pointing out how to be saved. These visits often took me to the bedside of the sick and dying, as well as to the homes of the poor, the afflicted and the bereaved, where the consolations of the Gospel were each referred to in connection with praying and with bereaved ones and those desolate in heart. The brightness of the Christian life was often the happy theme by the fireside, as well as in the public discourse.

Sermons and addresses, 3,649. In all of these, while always keeping in sight of the Sunday School and other Christian agencies, I aimed never to close a sermon or address without explaining to sinners, briefly but plainly, the way of salvation. I found that preaching and delivering Sunday School addresses were helpful, the one of the other branch of service. In spring and summer the addresses were more numerous than the sermons, but the latter were not omitted. In cold weather the sermons were the more numerous, especially during revivals and protracted meetings. The number of these which I conducted, with others in which I assisted, was about eighty, usually lasting from one week to five, and in which God in love and mercy converted many souls. Some I witnessed more than a hundred additions annually in the meetings in which I labored, either with other laborers or alone, Word, or without ministerial assistance. Blessed be God! His Holy Spirit still blesses the preaching of His Word in simplicity. He ever continues gracious in converting sinners and regenerating those who receive the blessed Jesus by faith.

The addresses: They were delivered chiefly to Sunday Schools, Sunday School workers, and places where schools were to be organized; and by far the greatest number in the last class of the three named above. I sought out and planted new Sunday Schools in the darkest, poorest, and most neglected districts and villages that I could find; and often visited and encouraged feeble schools, that were scarcely less needy than the class of new schools just described. But as one great need of the work was, and is, a supply of competent, consecrated officers and teachers, I gladly availed myself of opportunities of addressing the students of colleges, academies, and high schools, and of helping, in my humble measure, by addresses and otherwise, Sunday School institutions and conventions, township, county, district, state, and inter-state; denominational and union, numbering in all about 80. Missionary letters and cards (including circulars), 8,142. This has been a laborious and important part of the work, the more laborious because by a regulation of the Society, they were mainly by the pen and without abbreviations, as in that way they seemed to be better suited to the necessities of the work. Miles traveled, 84,035; or more than three times the circumference of the whole earth; a great deal of it by private conveyance—in buggy or wagon, on horseback or on foot, as circumstances required.

"Wayside ministries: In this connection I can only refer to the unnumbered opportunities embraced of preaching, or telling the Gospel to individuals on the highway, in fields, trains, etc., whereby thousands were conversed with individually about their souls, thousands to whom the Scriptures were distributed, and thousands of Gospel books, tracts, and periodicals were distributed as a personal work outside of and additional to the periodicals furnished as missionary to the Sunday Schools. These last I judge to have numbered more than 500,000 copies, mostly through the mails by my order.

"Relief Work: Among the delightful memories of my service are those connected with ministering to the temporal necessities of the people suffering from the flood at Alexandria and McGregor, Mo., and from the awful forest fires in north Minnesota, at Hinckley and vicinity, in September, 1894; and of ministering to the distressed drought sufferers of Kansas and Nebraska in January and February, 1895. All the expenses for this relief work were borne by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, except one carload furnished by the communities of Roanoke and Armstrong, in Howard county, Mo., and I suppose there were probably 20,000 people thus relieved in their distress from flood, and fire, and drought. I was but one of the numerous agents employed by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in relieving the Western drought sufferers.

"I cannot close without acknowledging the constant and wonderful goodness of God in all the eighteen years and one month of missionary and evangelistic labors past, and asking your readers to help me praise him. And may God bless the American Sunday School Union in spreading the Gospel among the young of whom there are probably ten millions over four and under twenty years of age who are not in Sunday Schools.

Our two photographs on this page deal with phases of the average Sunday School missionary's experience in comparatively new sections of the country where there are but few of the conveniences of civilized communities. One presents a view of a typical frontier home, whose young people never knew what a Sunday School was like until the American Sunday School Union missionary came among them. Concerning this particular section a missionary writes: "This is called the 'Pocket Union Sunday School,' South Dakota. The name comes from the fact that this tract of land is almost surrounded by the Missouri River. Here I found a very ignorant and needy people; only a few families, but almost entirely cut off from all school and church privileges. The children were growing up in ignorance and poverty. I found one girl sixteen years old unable to read or write; also one family of six children, none of whom had ever been to a day school. The father, however, was a Christian man, and had taught his children how to read. A Sunday School was organized and held in this private home as there was no school building in the place. I have visited this school often, and was always greatly pleased to find the children so eagerly interested. It was a school that would remind one of the days of Robert Raikes. The children were taught to read as well as to learn their Sunday School lesson.

"One of my recent trips was made in the pine forests, where I had quite a hard experience, as the weather was stormy and cold all the time. The openings in the timber seemed to run in all directions, ending nowhere. In one place I was forced to ford a river with my little team. It was not so very deep but the current was very swift, and the bed very rocky, but I got through all right. I soon came upon a great many cabins and lovely bright-eyed children, but the parents were cold and indifferent with regard to religion, and their dear boys and girls were growing up in utter ignorance of God's Word, and disregard of the Sabbath. Notwithstanding the many drawbacks experienced along the way, I do not think I ever made a more successful tour. I am now engaged in a revival service on an island where there is quite a little settlement. It was here that I organized my first Sunday School on entering the work, and where the people have been neglected up to this time beyond my occasional visits to their nice Union Sunday School, and to their homes."

CHEERING THE DYING.

Mrs. Lathrop Tells An Incident of Her Work in the Slums.

MRS. Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, who is conducting a medical missionary work among the sick poor in lower New York, relates this touching incident in her recent experience:

"At seven o'clock one evening a boy of twelve called at my office, at 668 Water street, with a note, directing me to go, if possible, to an address where a poor old woman was dying alone. It happened that she was one of my pensioners, whom I particularly valued. I entered the alley-way and opened the door on the ground floor where she had lived for years in dampness, almost cellar-like darkness, and growing poverty. She lay before me, pale and pinched by the last illness she would suffer. She had heard that a lady would be sent to her relief, but she had not known I was that friend in need, and her joy was great, as she loved me.

"Money for her rent had been given her by the unfailingly kind-heart that had summoned me, and I bought food and medicine. The almost imperceptible tones of the woman's voice began to utter more distinct words. 'And to think that it is you, to think it is you!' she exclaimed, holding both my hands clingly in hers. 'You, who have kept the little place for me ever since my sickness with pneumonia, and have kept the life in me! Always when I was walking the road or sitting alone, I prayed to the good God to send me a kind friend in my last hours, and He has not forgotten my prayer now.' Blessings poured upon me from her lips, and her gaze into my face soothed my fatigue. 'But the nights are very long,' she moaned. 'The lonely nights with no soul to speak to me! Oh, the dreadful nights alone by myself!'

"'Not alone,' I said, 'God is inside this room all night long; God and the angels; and he is a better friend than any of us!'

"Her face brightened. 'God is always inside this room—yes, that is true; I am never alone!'

"'Let me stay with you to-night,' I begged. She insisted upon being lifted into a sitting position, and then flung her arms around my neck. 'No, no, you must not do it!' she cried. 'Promise me you will go home and rest! You are tiring yourself out! Promise to keep your health, that you may live to rally many a poor creature who is dying of hunger, as you rallied me! Go home to-night.'

"She clung to me so anxiously that I had to promise to leave her again without a nurse, except for a half hour at morning and evening, and three or four calls daily from my helpers and myself. 'She had begged me not to call to see her myself the next day, but only to send messengers. I could not forego the consolation of talking with one whose sacred prayers had strengthened my courage; whose unselfish sweetness had buoyed up my belief in the pure loveliness of many destitute women. Again her delight at seeing me was deliciously welcome to my soul. Again her tenderness reminded me of my mother's, and made me weep. As she spoke of what I had done for her in her dire need, I could only say to myself that it was I who should thank her for the peace she had given me. A fierce noise of stamping and scolding above us startled us both. She said it often happened, as the people in the tenement-house were very rough and degraded. The noises often hurt her head very much.

"Every hour she grew more distant in tone and glance, yet loving and gracious, and generously forgetful of her great needs, as if she were already nearly in heaven.

"Why should care for such sweet natures be unusual; care, I mean, from those who are responsively tender, and whose lives might be wasted elsewhere?"

ROSE HAWTHORNE LATHROP.

BENEDICTION FOR DOCTORS.

A Sermon by

on the Text, II. Chron. 16: 12, 13; 17: 16.

And Asa, in the thirty and ninth year of his reign, was diseased in his feet until his disease was exceeding great; yet in his disease he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians. And Asa slept with his fathers.

THIS season of the year, when medical colleges of all schools of medicine are giving diplomas to young doctors, and at the Capitol and in many of the cities medical associations are assembling to consult about the advancement of the interests of their profession, I feel this discourse is appropriate.

In my text is King Asa with the gout. High living and no exercise have vitiated his blood, and my text presents him with his inflamed and bandaged feet on an ottoman. In defiance of God, whom he hated, he sends for certain conjurers or quacks. They come and give him all sorts of lotions and panaceas. They bleed him. They sweat him. They drug him. They cut him. They kill him. He was only a young man, and had a disease which, though very painful, seldom proves fatal to a young man, and he ought to have got well; but he fell a victim to charlatany and empiricism. "And Asa in the thirty and ninth year of his reign was diseased in his feet, until his disease was exceeding great; yet in his disease he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians. And Asa slept with his fathers." That is, the doctors killed him.

In this sharp and graphic way the Bible sets forth the truth, that you have no right to shut God out from the realm of pharmacy and therapeutics. If Asa had said: "O Lord, I am sick; bless the instrumentality employed for my recovery!" "Now, servant, go and get the best doctor you can find"—he would have recovered. In other words, the world wants divinely directed physicians. There are a great many such. The diplomas they received from the academies of medicine were nothing compared with the diploma they received from the Head Physician of the universe, on the day when they started out and he said to them: "Go heal the sick, and cast out the devils of pain, and open the blind eyes, and unstop the deaf ears." God bless the doctors all the world over! And let all the hospitals, and dispensaries, and infirmaries, and asylums, and domestic circles of the earth respond: "Amen."

Men of the medical profession we often meet in the home of distress. We shake hands across the cradle of agonized infancy. We join each other in an attempt at solace where the paroxysm of grief demands an anodyne as well as a prayer. We look into each other's sympathetic faces through the dusk, as the night of death is falling in the sick room. We do not have to climb over any barrier to-day in order to greet each other, for our professions are in full sympathy. You, doctor, are our first and last earthly friend. You stand at the gates of life when we enter this world, and you stand at the gates of death when we go out of it. In the loss of moments of our earthly existence with the end of the wife, or mother, or sister, or daughter, shall hold our right hand, and give strength to our dying moment. We can feel the tips of your fingers on the pulse of the left wrist. We do not meet to-day, as on other days, in houses of distress, but by the pleasant altars of God, and I propose a sermon of hopefulness and good cheer. As in the nursery children sometimes re-enact all the scenes of the sick room, so to-day you play that you are the patient and that I am the physician, and take my prescription just once. It shall be a tonic, a sedative, a dietetic, a stimulant, and an anodyne at the same time. "Is there not balm in Gilead? Is there not a physician there?"

In the first place, I think all the medical profession should become Christians because of the debt of gratitude they owe to God for the honor he has put upon their calling. No other calling in all the world, except it be that of the Christian ministry, has received so great an honor as yours. Christ himself was not only preacher, but physician, surgeon, aurist, ophthalmologist, and under his mighty power optic and auditory nerve thrilled with light and sound, and catalepsy arose from its fit, and the club foot was straightened, and ankylosis went out of the stiffened tendons, and the foaming maniac became placid as a child, and the streets of Jerusalem became an extemporized hospital crowded with convalescent victims of casualty and invalidism. All ages have woven the garland for the doctor's brow. Homer said:

A wise physician, skilled our wounds to heal,
Is more than armies to the public weal.

Cicero said: "There is nothing in which men so approach the gods as when they try to give health to other men." Charles IX. made proclamation that all the Protestants in France should be put to death on St. Bartholomew's day, but made one exception, and that the case of Pare, the father of French surgery. The battlefields of the American Revolution welcomed Drs. Mercer, and Warren, and Rush. When the French army was entirely demoralized at fear of the plague, the leading surgeon of that army inoculated himself with the plague to show the soldiers there was no contagion in it; and their courage rose, and they went on to the conflict. God has honored this profession all the way through. Oh, the advancement from the days when Hippocrates tried to cure the great Pericles with hellebore and flax-seed poultices down to far later centuries when Haller announced the theory of respiration, and Harvey the circulation of the blood, and Aselli the uses of the lymphatic vessels, and Jenner balked the worst disease that ever scourged Europe, and Sydenham developed the recuperative forces of the physical organism, and cinchona bark stopped the shivering agues of the world, and Sir Astley Cooper and Abernethy, and Hosack, and Romeyn, and Griscom, and Valentine Mott of the generation just past, honored God, and fought back death with their keen scalpels.

This profession has done wonders for public hygiene! How often they have stood between this nation and Asiatic cholera, and the yellow fever! The monuments in Greenwood, and Mount Auburn, and Laurel Hill tell something of the story of those men who stood face to face with pestilence in Southern cities, until staggering in their own sickness they stumbled across the corpses of those whom they had come to save. This profession has been the successful advocate of ventilation, sewerage, drainage, and fumigation, until their sentiments were well expressed by Lord Palmerston, when he said to the English nation at the time a fast had been proclaimed to keep off a great pestilence: "Clean your streets, or death will ravage, notwithstanding all the prayers of this nation. Clean your streets, and then call on God for help."

See what this profession has done for human longevity. There was such a fearful subtraction from human life that there was a prospect that within a few centuries this world would be left almost inhabitantless. Adam started with a whole eternity of earthly existence before him; but he cut off the most of it and only comparatively few years were left—only seven hundred years of life, and then five hundred, and then four hundred, and then two hundred, and then one hundred, and then fifty, and then the average of human life came to forty, and then it dropped to eighteen. But medical science came in, and since the sixteenth century, the average of human life has risen from eighteen years to forty-four; and it will continue to rise until the average of human life will be fifty, and it will be sixty, and it will be seventy, and a man will have no right to die before ninety, and the prophecy of Isaiah will be literally fulfilled: "And the child shall die a hundred years old." The millennium for the souls of men will be the millennium for the bodies of men. Sin done, disease will be done—the clergyman and the physician getting through with their work at the same time.

But it seems to me that the most beautiful benediction of the medical profession has been dropped upon the poor. No excuse now for any one's not having scientific attendance. Dispensaries and infirmaries everywhere under the control of the best doctors, some of them poorly paid, some of them not paid at all. A half-starved woman comes out from the low tenement house into the dispensary, and unwraps the rags from her babe, a bundle of ulcers, and rheum, and pustules, and over that little sufferer bends the accumulated wisdom of the ages, from Esculapius down to last week's autopsy. In one dispensary, in one year, one hundred and fifty thousand prescriptions were issued.

Another reason why I think the medical profession ought to be Christians, is because there are so many trials and annoyances in that profession that need positive Christian solace. I know you have the gratitude of a great many good people, and I know it must be a grand thing to walk intelligently through the avenues of human life, and with anatomic skill poise yourself on the nerves and fibres which cross and recross this wonderful physical system. I suppose a skilled eye can see more beauty even in malformation than an architect can point out in any of his structures, though it be the very triumph of arch, and plinth, and abacus. But how many annoyances and trials the medical profession have. Dr. Rush used to say, in his valedictory address to the students of the medical college: "Young gentlemen, have two pockets—a small pocket and a big pocket; a small pocket in which to put your fees, a large pocket in which to put your annoyances."

In the first place, the physician has no Sabbath. Busy merchants, and lawyers, and mechanics, cannot afford to be sick during the secular week, and so they nurse themselves along with lozenges and horehound candy until Sabbath morning comes, and then they say: "I must have a doctor." And that spoils the Sabbath morning church service for the physician. Beside that, there are a great many men who dine but once a week with their families. During the secular days they take a hasty lunch at the restaurant, and on the Sabbath they make up for their six days' abstinence by especial gormandizing, which, before night makes their amazed digestive organs cry out for a doctor. And that spoils the evening church service for the physician.

Then they are annoyed by people coming too late. Men wait until the last fortress of physical strength is taken, and death has dug around it the trench of the grave, and then they run for the doctor. The slight fever which might have been cured with a foot-bath, has become virulent typhus, and the hacking cough, killing pneumonia. As though a captain should sink his ship off Amagansett, and then put ashore in a yawl, and then come to New York to the marine office, and want to get his vessel insured. Too late for the ship, too late for the patient.

Then there are many who always blame the doctor because the people die, forgetting the Divine enactment: "It is appointed unto all men once to die." Oh, how easy it is when people die, to cry out: "malpractice." Then the physician must bear with all the whims, and the sophistries, and the deceptions, and the stratagems, and the irritations of the shattered nerves and the beclouded brain of women, and more especially of men, who never know how gracefully to be sick. To keep up under this nervous strain, to go through this night-work, to bear all these annoyances, many physicians have resorted to strong drink and perished. Others have appealed to God for sympathy and help, and have lived. Which were the wise doctors, judge ye?

Again: The medical profession to be Christians because there are special exigencies when they need Asa's destruction by unblest physicians was a warning. There are awful in every medical practice when a ought to know how to pray. All of ills will sometimes hurl themselves the weak points of the physical organism with equal ferocity will assault tire line of susceptibility to sin. The next dose of medicine will whether or not the happy home is broken up. Shall it be this medicine that medicine? God help! Between the five drops and the ten may be the question of life or death. Shall it be the five or the ten drops? careful how you put that knife to those delicate portions of the body it swing out of the way the sixth pain inch, the patient perishes. Under circumstances a physician needs much consultation with men of high calling, as he needs consultation with God who strung the nerves and bled the cells, and swung the crimson tide in the arteries.

I do not mean to say that physicians make up for medical skill. A brilliant doctor, confounded with what was very bad case, went into the next room to pray. A skilled physician was called. He asked for the first practitioner. They said, "he's in the next room praying." "Well," said the skilled doctor, "he is to come out here and help; he is to work at the same time." It is in that sentence. Do the best we can ask God to help us. There are men in all the world, it seems to me, so much need the grace of God to minister who doctors the sick so as the physician who prescribes for the eased body.

Another reason why the medical profession ought to be Christians, is because there opens before them such a field for Christian usefulness. You see many people in pain, in trouble, in bereavement. You ought to be the very heaven to their souls. Old Dr. G. De Witt, a practitioner of New York, in his last days: "I always preached religion of Christ to my patients, directly or indirectly, and I find it is most always acceptable." Doctors Crombie and Brown, of Scotland, Dr. Hey and Fothergill, of England, Dr. Rush, of our own country, were celebrated for their faithfulness in that duty. "Oh," says the medical profession, "is your occupation; that belongs to the clergy, not to us." My brother, the severe illnesses in which you will permit even the clergy, and that permanent salvation will depend upon your faithfulness. With the medicine for the one hand, and the medicine for the other, oh, what a chance!

But I must close, for there may be suffering men and women waiting in your office, or on the hot pillow, wondering you don't come. But before you, doctors, hear my prayer for your salvation. Blessed will be the reward heaven for the faithful Christian physician.

Some day, through much overwork, from bending over a patient and catching his contagious breath, the doctor goes home, and he lies down faint and sick. He is too weary to feel his own pulse. He takes the diagnosis of his own condition. He is worn out. The fact is his earthly is ended. Tell those people in your office there they need not wait any longer. The doctor will never go there again. I have written his last prescription for the alleviation of human pain. The people run up his front steps and inquire: "Is the doctor to-day?" All the sympathy of the neighborhood will be aroused. There will be many prayers that I have been so kind to the sick may be comforted in his last pang. It is all over. In two or three days, his convalescent patients, with shawl wrapped around them will come to the front window and look out at the passing hearse, and the city, bare-footed and bare-headed, stand on the street corner, saying: "How good he was to us all!" But on the other side of the river of death stand his old patients, who are forever waiting will come out to welcome him, at the Physician of heaven, with locks as white as snow, according to the Apocalypse, will come out and say, "Come in. I was sick and ye visited me."

INDIA'S FIGHT WITH FAMINE.

Missionaries Grateful for Aid—Julian Hawthorne Brings Back from India the Report that Three Millions have Starved to Death.

OUR India relief work is now nearing a close. On Saturday next, June 12th, at four o'clock P. M. the relief steamer City of Everett, will sail from San Francisco for Calcutta, with a valuable food cargo, the united offerings of thousands of Christian men and women throughout the Union. Shortly afterward, another steamer will carry a similar cargo to New York to the same Indian seaport. These vessels will thus be ploughing waves simultaneously, bound on a mission of mercy and life-saving, and approaching their common destination from opposite directions. They will carry with them the prayers of the great army of children on this side of the globe, whose hearts have been touched with sympathy for the suffering millions of India. It is well known to all who have watched the progress of this relief movement, that a valuable time was consumed in the procuring of steamers to carry the cargoes to India. Nearly two months have elapsed since Congress passed the necessary appropriation, but Navy officials, through whom the arrangements were to be concluded, met insurmountable difficulties in chartering American vessels, as called for under the resolution. Weeks were consumed resulting in expectations were raised only to be followed by repeated disappointment. This was to us a source of real regret, as it must have been to many others. Finally, as a last resort, Congress was compelled to modify its resolution, so as to permit the use of suitable vessels of any nationality, and this was done only a few days ago. We are now assured that there will be no more delays, and that the transportation demanded for the gifts from that have been accumulated in warehouses here will be pushed forthwith. During the negotiations, Secretary Long and Navy Department officials have dealt with rare courtesy and have endeavored to hasten matters. Had the resolution of Congress been such as would have permitted greater latitude to the Department, the delays might have been avoided. It is a matter for thankfulness that the starving people did not have to wait the arrival of the consignments for the expression of Christian America's sympathy. The remittances of money cabled to American missionaries in the afflicted land told them in the most practical and substantial way that Christian people here had the spirit of Christ. The missionaries, to whom the remittances were sent, have gladly applied the money in relief in various ways that we have convinced the poor creatures of Christians, thousands of miles away, of hearts to feel for their misery and would not allow them to perish for lack of food. Already letters from the missionaries have been published, which show the help thus rendered is most gratefully received, and that the relief they have been enabled to distribute is likely to help them in their work. The following extracts from later letters are to the same purpose and they prove also how truly such help was needed:

Henry Forman, American Presbyterian Missionary, of Fatehgarh, writes: "I have now been five weeks since we began providing food for people at the Mission Compound. The number soon rose to about 100 persons, mostly men, and very few women. We sent twenty-three men to Rawal Pindee, the United Presbyterian missionaries undertaking the care of these, and of the other villages in Allahabad. After this a report was sent that we were getting people together to send them off to Demarara, and the result was the sending of twenty or thirty children and a number of men. At the same time the harvest—a very small one—was being gathered, so our number here kept small for the next fortnight. Since then the number of people has been steadily increasing, and to-day's number was three hundred and twenty. "We require work (which we make for them in the compound, digging, burning lime, repairs, etc.) of 400 men. Just about one-half are children, and one-quarter of the remaining half are women. We give both food, ready cooked, and pice (clothes), these being based on the Government scale of relief, the food being rather more, however, as the food is cheaper than the pice. Most of the people prefer the food—to-day 77 out of 320 taking the pice, and 43 taking food.

Our expenses have now almost reached the rate of 700 rupees (about $230) a month; before this month is over they will almost certainly have exceeded that rate. And if the money is forthcoming so that I dare go ahead, I do not doubt our numbers and expenditure will be doubled next month. "Government is decreasing its provision, both in poor-houses and relief works. What the reason is I do not at all know. But for the next three months the distress must greatly increase, and indeed there cannot be any decided improvement for six months yet. "You will understand that I am carrying on simply famine-relief at present. There is no institution, such as school or orphanage. When the famine is over, the people will return to their villages. That, by the way, is the reason we give pice to those who wish them. We are not willing to appear to use the people's distress as a means of breaking their caste. Nor do we want to appear to be using money to make Christians. However, almost all of those who come have already professed caste, eating whatever they could get. "We have a daily service with the people, very brief, and always have them stand and close their eyes while we ask a blessing before eating. This, of course, is new for them. We do earnestly hope that the help rendered will be the means of bringing many into Christ's kingdom when the famine is over. "Miss Lillian E. Deitrich, of Cawnpore, to whom another sum has been sent, writes: "The famine is indeed all about us; the greatest need, however, is in the villages where there are few or no English people living to whom these poor starved people can go for a bit of food, so as soon as I receive the money I will take part of it and with Mrs. Pickard will go out in the villages in the Rae Bareilly District where the distress is and has been extreme in its severity; another part of the money will be used for those starving ones who come to the door here in Cawnpore; such a one that may be very hard pressed, and then through the organization that we have, of watching for all deserving cases among Hindus and others, and helping them to tide over the hard times. . . . I am in correspondence with my agents in the district south of Bombay, and when arranged our help will be given in a systematic and wise way in that region. It is needless to say that the money you have sent is needed, and much more will be needed if help is to be rendered at all commensurate with the needs, and I shall be glad to receive any other sum that may be entrusted to me for use among the people. I pray that God's blessing may rest on all who have given to the relief of human suffering in this land.

A JOURNALIST'S TESTIMONY.

The reports of the suffering published from week to week in these columns as they were supplied to us by the missionaries are fully confirmed by the independent testimony of Mr. Julian Hawthorne who has just returned from a journey to India which he took at the request of Mr. John Brisben Walker for the Cosmopolitan Magazine. Mr. Hawthorne's full story is to be published in the July number of that periodical, but its character is disclosed in an interview which he accorded to a reporter of the New York Herald. Mr. Hawthorne said, after describing the horrors of the plague: "The plague is but a flea-bite in comparison with the famine. The former is confined to Bombay and its neighborhood; the latter, save for a few spots here and there, extends all over India. Three million people have already died. These are only the official figures. How many more have actually died it is impossible to say. The figures only cover the statistics which the government has been able to obtain. But these statistics constitute a small proportion of the actual grain dealers, who oppress them. The bunnias are amiable, nice, fat people. They sit with their grain baskets in front of them, smiling and well fed. Around them gather the poor little suffering children. They look like little black beetles. Their ribs show through their breasts and backs, their arms and legs are mere bones, their skin is drawn tight over their faces, but their intestines are frightfully distended. They search longingly over the ground to pick up any grains of wheat that may be scattered around. The sleek, smiling bunnia never for a moment thinks of giving them a handful out of his basket, nor does it ever occur to a child to make a dash for it. All are absolutely resigned to their fate.

"The gentleness of the native is pitiful. I have sat in the villages under the verandas of missionaries. People begin to flock around from all quarters. They never talk unless spoken to, and even then they never complain. The same scenes are enacted in the starvation camp, little sheds which are scattered all around. You come in, and they tell you their sad stories if they are asked—how they sold out all they had and then could not get enough to eat; how their fathers or their mothers or their children have been swept away. Many are unable to sit up, some are unable to talk. Indeed the native overseers of the camp endeavor to keep them from talking for very obvious reasons.

"There seems to be an impression in America that the English in India are not doing as much as they ought to do.

But in fact it is the universal opinion of all the missionaries that they are doing the best of which they are capable. Indeed, so much is evident to a casual observer. It is impressive to see the small force of Englishmen slaving to try to avoid what cannot be averted. You can't make much headway against a famine that threatens three hundred millions of people. The missionaries are of all sects, Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists and Catholics. I do not know why it is, but the Catholics do not seem to be effective here as they always have been in other places. The Catholic districts are no better off than any of the others."

HINDOO CHRISTIANS.

"Do the missionaries make many converts?" the reporter asked. "Yes, a great many, and there are no more charming people in the world than the native Christians. They seem to realize for you your ideas of what the primitive Christianity may have been. Like the primitive Christians they have given up everything for what they hold to be the truth. Christianity appears to change the nature of both the Hindoo and the Mohammedan. There seems to be two natures in every Hindoo. One is a very amiable, obliging, kindly fellow, the other is an austere and narrow minded ascetic, whose better self is strangled under the inherited racial barbarities of caste and traditions. "Christianity takes out all the racial traits. It inculcates good principles, and the result is a charming, amiable, and good creature, who actually believes what he professes. He usually has a lovely expression and lovely manners. Of course there are hypocrites among the converts men or women who profess to believe in order to live upon the missionaries. But these are not many; the sacrifices are too enormous. A convert to Christianity becomes an anathema to his family and friends. He is dead to his own people. So you may judge what courage and patience and fortitude it takes to become and remain a Christian. It is true that after a few years his old friends cease to show any active hatred for him. They seem to come to the conclusion that converts are insane and are not responsible for their actions, and in any event they will be frightfully punished in the next world. So they cease trying to rob him of punishment while alive. If India is ever really to be converted it will be through the efforts of these Christianized Hindoos. "This is the testimony of a trained journalist as to the scenes of which he was an eye-witness. It proves conclusively that the missionaries' statements have not been exaggerated, and that starvation in India has for months past been carrying multitudes to untimely graves.

FAMINE CHILDREN AFTER A FEW WEEKS CARE AT BAREILLY, INDIA.

has just come—a man whose bones are much more prominent than any of those in the famine pictures which I send you, he was so weak that he could not stand without trembling violently. I gave him some uncooked rice and dal with wood with which to cook it; poor man, he became so excited at the sight of food that he quite broke down, then fearing from his weakness that he would not even have strength to cook his food I tried to induce him to take a little bread from our own table, but he was one who with his dying breath still clung to his caste; the raw food he was very thankful to get, the cooked food would break his caste—dearer to him than life itself. I am glad to say, however, all are not as tenacious of caste in their starvation as this poor man.

Rev. John G. McGavran, Missionary, of the Church of the Disciples at Damoh, India, to whom one of our remittances was made, writes:

There are hundreds of villages in this district with one or two, or not even a single soul left—all dead or gone. . . . I am now employing a large body, almost wholly women and children, on relief work. I expect thus to increase beyond my means of support, as I personally pay out all wages and all support for the helpless. With the $500 sent by you I can keep this work up for some months. . . . I can use an indefinite sum here. We are in the vortex of the famine, and being in an obscure corner, miss the great stream of relief. . . . I have a thousand scenes photographed on my brain, which will make me grow pale to recall fifty years hence. With thanks to you and through you to the great hearted Christian people at home from many a man and woman, and hundreds of little children, who, but for your sacrifices, must be doomed to hopeless poverty, famine and death, and an assurance that the gift will be used to the best possible advantage.

Dr. J. E. Abbott, American Board Missionary at Byculla, Bombay, India, writes:

It is needless to say how much I thank you for the sum of $500 which you have sent to me to be used for the relief of the people suffering from plague and famine. . . . I propose to use the money you sent, first, in relieving such Christian families number. Thus, while I was in India, 10,000 people were reported to have died. Now, it was estimated by those who are in a position to know that the number was nearer 60,000. . . . Remember that there are in India 300,000,000 of people. Naturally it is extremely difficult to cope with so general a calamity.

"In every relief camp there are a large number of scoundrels. The native overseers put out or refuse to accept the people who really need relief, and put in friends of their own who are well and comfortable and divide up with them. Nor do the deserving patients resent these abuses; they look upon them as perfectly natural. They would do the same thing themselves if they were placed in the same position.

"Of course the government is dimly aware of this condition of things, but it cannot prove or expose it. When the white inspector comes along on his periodical tour, his coming is known for hours before he reaches the relief camp. While he is approaching all the skeletons are put out of the way, the lies to be told are concocted, and every employe is drilled as to exactly what he shall say and do. Therefore the inspectors do not know half as much as the missionaries. It was to the missionaries I attached myself. We visited many of the relief camps. All the usual lies were told us, but we knew pretty well what was back of them.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

PERSONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Sunday School Lesson for June 20. Rom.

14: 10-21. Golden Text: Rom. 14: 21.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

HE pre-eminent glory of a Christian is his union with Christ. The pre-eminent glory of "the Church which is his body" (Eph. 1: 22), is that in a wonderful and glorious sense she has the high calling to constitute a union of many in one; a being, a person, "a perfect man" (Eph. 4: 13), composed of many members, after the pattern of the adorable Three in One. What then is the personal responsibility of the members of such a Body? Paul tells us, and he speaks of it as "the vocation wherewith ye were called." It is this: "Endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" (Eph. 4: 3), and he shows that this personal responsibility to all our fellow-members entails "all lowliness and meekness, long-suffering, forbearing one another in love."

The Apostle Paul has been showing in the preceding chapters the practical outcome of the position which is the only reasonable service [or spiritual worship, R.V.] of a true Christian, that of a living sacrifice. The living sacrifice is made to God, and is "holy, acceptable" to him, but all the outcome of the sacrifice, all its practical working, touches our relations to man; and it is in these relations that we are to be not conformed to [or fashioned according to] this world, but transformed by the renewing of our mind, that we may "prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God." And immediately the Apostle speaks of our relations one to the other "according as God hath dealt to each man a measure of faith. For as we have many members in one body, and all members have not the same office, so we being many are one body in Christ, and every one members one of another." Thus our personal responsibility is just that of the members of our own physical bodies, which are by their very form and functions interdependent, each one "having the same care one for another" (1 Cor. 12: 25).

In the early Church, when all the members, being filled with the Holy Ghost, were "of one heart and of one mind" (Acts 4: 32) this state of things existed, every member was subservient to the Head, and through him to the whole body. Only thus could the body of Christ be in health and vigor, and only thus could make it healthy to-day. The sacrifice upon the altar was yielded up as fuel to keep alive the fire from heaven which was ever burning there. Only the yielded will and personality of the members can keep ever burning the fire of divine life in the Church of Christ. Very practically, and in much detail, Paul has been speaking of the exercise of spiritual gifts, and of our dealings with men in almost all possible positions in this spirit of living sacrifice, and he sums up all by saying, "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof; i. e., put on himself and put off yourself." It is on this principle that the Apostle goes on to speak of

EATING AND DRINKING.

It is not a thing of slight importance. Eating and drinking sustain our life, and yet through eating and drinking, seeds of poison and death are often sown. It is of high importance that we should know how to eat and drink, as how to do all else, in the spirit of living sacrifice. Paul speaks of two believers. One had a right to eat all things, one who is weak eateth herbs. Paul does not decide in favor of either of the one or the other, but says, "Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him that eateth not judge him that eateth for God hath received him. Who art thou that judgest another man's servant? to his own master he standeth or falleth. Yet he shall be holden up for God is able to make him stand." Here the true principle of the living sacrifice is involved. God may have shown me a certain path in eating and drinking, or in some other thing: I am sure of God's guidance. How can my brother be right if he does not see as I see? I may speak to him but his eyes are hidden, he cannot, he does not see as I do. What is God teaching me, what is he teaching him? Surely to yield up to God all spirit of judgment. God may have a reason for guiding the hand of the Body in a way very different from the foot but if the hand and the foot maintain their close relation to the Head, the very disparity of office and of direction from the Head creates a service of the one member to the other. That which stops the circulation and paralyzes the Body is the spirit of judgment and criticism. "Let every man be fully assured in his own mind," not tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine. And this can be only as he stands with God, knows clearly his mind. In the matter of observance of days there need be no controversy, "He that regardeth the day regardeth it unto the Lord, and he that regardeth not the day to the Lord he doth not regard it. He that eateth eateth to the Lord, for he giveth God thanks, and he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not, and giveth God thanks." Paul was speaking of converted people whose honest desire was to please God.

What bitterness and strife, what heart-burnings and jealousies, what unkind words, what acts of persecution might have been avoided, if Christians had carried out the principle of these words! Oh that each one would consider that his believing brother member may hold as direct a relation to the Head of the body as he himself! Oh that he could see that the very fact of his brother's misunderstanding of him was a special test from God whether indeed he can sacrifice himself so as to suspend his judgment of his brother until the Lord come; whether he can for the sake of Christ and his body love honor and respect him as much as though he saw with him on every point! It is true of us all, "Now I know in part." (1 Cor. 13: 12). And it is of infinitely more importance that we should keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace than that we should all see alike in every detail. Many of our most precious lessons come in this very direction of patient waiting until honored brothers or sisters who do not see things as we see them are either brought of God to see as we do, or we are brought to see as they do; and such as really live unto the Lord are always ready for fresh light, and a disparity of opinion cannot cause even a jar, where both parties are in the same spirit of loyalty to God, and of living sacrifice to Christ and his Church.

"None of us liveth unto himself." Christ died for us that they which live should henceforth live, not unto themselves but unto him which died for them and rose again. Here is the living sacrifice! And no man dieth unto himself, for whether we live we live unto the Lord, and whether we die we die to the Lord; whether we live therefore or die, we are the Lord's. The living sacrifice has no longer a claim to himself he has passed into other hands. Therefore for the second and third time Paul condemns the judging of our brethren. "But judge this rather than no man put a stumbling-block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way. Now the apostle returns to the question of eating and drinking. Nothing, he says, is unclean of itself; "it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer," (1 Tim. 4: 5), but to him that esteemeth it to be unclean, to him it is unclean. Who knows what may have passed between him and God? Who knows why he should esteem that to be unclean to him which another can eat with perfect impunity, let us respect God's dealings with our brethren even when we cannot understand them, for the thread is not in our hands. But if thy brother be grieved with thy meat now walkest thou not charitably ("not in love" R.V.) We have been called to liberty, not to use as an occasion to the flesh, but by love to serve one another. (Gal. 5: 13.)

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

EVERY generation has needed the teaching Paul gives in this lesson. Sometimes in one form, sometimes in another, a disposition has been manifested to insist on matters that seem unimportant to a Christian who has grasped the high spiritual truths of Christianity.

A SPRING OUT OF THE ROCK.
"No every one that thirsteth come ye to the waters." (Isa. 55: 1.)

In Paul's time, it showed itself in observance of the Levitical law and especially in the matter of the kind of meat that was eaten. It appears that when an animal was offered in sacrifice to idols and was slaughtered, the carcass was sold to the butcher who put it among the meat in his store and sold it with the other meat. It was thus possible that a Christian might buy and eat part of an animal that had been solemnly dedicated to an idol. Paul and other enlightened Christians perceived that this did not signify. As Christ had explained, the soul could not be injured by anything of the kind. But there were some Christians who were horrified at the idea of eating such meat and they refused to eat meat at all, lest they should unwittingly eat some of that which had been offered in sacrifice. There were such people; it could not be helped; it was a pity, and that they had not more sense; but their scruples could not be ignored. What ought to be the attitude of the more enlightened Christians in the circumstances? That is the question with which Paul deals. He counsels a spirit of brotherly love and kindly yielding which would tend to peace. He reminds people like himself that the weak brother really believes that it is sinful to eat the meat. If he did eat it when his conscience condemned it, it really would be in his case. The conscience is not always right, but it is the best light a man has and he would do wrong to disobey it. It was creditable in a man to refrain from eating meat in order to avoid a risk which seemed to him serious. His motive was good; not every one is so careful to avoid sin. It might be hoped he was equally careful not to sin in greater matters. Assistance to sin and self-denial to avoid it, were excellent traits in a man's character, which should be encouraged not ridiculed. Paul declared that if through his example people were led to do what they believed to be wrong he would feel grieved. He would do as they did, so that they might be encouraged in the fight they were waging against sin. He would respect scruples which he did not share. That is the principle he laid down for the guidance of future ages.

It is this principle that lies at the basis of Christian Temperance. A man says, "I never get intoxicated; I can drink a glass of wine and enjoy it; I am not tempted to take too much. Why should I abstain?" This principle laid down by Paul gives the reason. Every man is a certain sense his brother's keeper. There are some men who cannot moderate in the use of intoxicants. Their craving comes irresistible when they taste them. They must go on drinking until they become intoxicated. We wish it were not so; we wish they had more moral strength; but we must recognize the fact. How can we help them? It is our duty to do it if we can. We may help them by abstaining. There may be danger in our case. That is all the more noble our part to give up the gratification for the sake of others to whom it may be dangerous. If only those abstained who are liable to become drunkards, they would be made men. We could not expect any lad to become an abstainer. It would be a confession of weakness, of which he would be ashamed. But that lad might be saved in this world and the next by abstaining. He is constituted that his only hope is total abstinence. He should be encouraged by all means. The one encouragement that he needs, the one that can really help him, to remove the stigma from all abstinence. If his father and his minister and most respectable and undoubted strength of moral character are total abstainers, he need not be ashamed to be so, too. The thing is respectable and he need not shrink from it. He is, as we say, keeping countenance by the countenance of others. Have not the strong men done a good and praiseworthy thing, if they have saved a lad from the gutter at the cost of some personal gratification? That is what Paul means in this passage. He would save the soul of his brother, and if he can save it by giving up something that he may lawfully do, something that he likes to do and that he has no harm from—he will surely give it up for his brother's sake. That is Christianity. Self-sacrifice for others. It is following Christ, who gave up so much and suffered so much that men might be saved.

An occasion to fall. A famous woman tells the story of a hospitable lady who entertained in her spacious grounds a large party of her neighbors. At the close of the day she said her servants would bring around trays of refreshment. The guests were simple country people and they proposed the glasses on the trays contained lemonade. One of them, however, had been a drunkard and was making a bare struggle to give up his evil habit. When he tasted the supposed lemonade he at once recognized it as rum-punch. His taste was like blood to a tiger. He could not resist his craving and hurried away to get more rum and yielding to his passion drank himself into insensibility.

OUR AMERICAN ALPS.

gnificance of the Snow-clad and Ice-bound Giants of the West—Shasta, Rainier, and St. Elias—A Royal Mountain-climbing Expedition.

Those who have been so fortunate as to visit the great snowy mountain range of the Northwest, it will be interesting to watch the progress of the royal mountain-climbing party, which lately left Italy for the purpose of visiting Alaska. The party is Prince Luigi Amedeo, who comes to America with the purpose of ascending Mount St. Elias's Peak, and other famous peaks. He will be assisted in his expedition by Dr. Paolo Vecchi, of San Francisco; Professor Fay, former President of the Appalachian Mountain Club, in Mass., and Professors Davidson and C. Russell, of the Geological Survey, and W. A. Ingraham, of Seattle. Prince Luigi will have a rival in the effort to ascend Mount St. Elias. An expedition under the auspices of the United States Government, and led by Mr. Henry

W. Henshaw, is estimated at 1177 square miles, or an average for each glacier of a little more than one square mile. On the same authority, the average height above sea-level at which they melt is about 7414 feet. The Grindewald glacier descends below 4000 feet, and one of the Mont Blanc glaciers reaches nearly as low a point. One of the largest of the Himalaya glaciers on the head waters of the Ganges does not, according to Captain Hodgson, descend below 12,914 feet. The largest of the Sierra glaciers on Mount Shasta descends to within 9500 feet of the level of the sea, which, as far as I have observed, is the lowest point reached by any glacier within the bounds of California, the average height of all being not far from 11,000 feet.

"A general exploration shows that to the north of California, through Oregon and Washington, groups of active glaciers still exist on all the high volcanic cones of the Cascade Range.—Mounts Pitt, Jefferson, Hood, St. Helens, Adams, Rainier, Baker, and others.—some of them of considerable size, though none of them approach the sea. Of these mountains Rainier, in Washington, is the highest and iciest. Its dome-like sumcupies a narrow, picturesque fiord about twenty miles to the northwest of the mouth of the Stikine River, in latitude 56 degrees and 50 minutes. The fiord is called by the natives "Huili," or Thunder Bay, from the noise made by the discharge of the icebergs. About one degree farther north there are four of these complete glaciers, discharging at the heads of the long arms of Holkam Bay. At the head of the Tahkoo Inlet, still farther north, there is one; and at the head and around the sides of Glacier Bay, trending in a general northerly direction from Cross Sound in latitude 58 degrees to 59 degrees, there are seven of these complete glaciers pouring bergs into the bay and its branches, and keeping up an eternal thundering. This fragmentary ice-sheet, and the immense glaciers about Mount St. Elias, together with the multitude of separate river-like glaciers that load the slopes of the coast mountains, evidently once formed part of a continuous ice sheet that flowed over all the region hereabouts, and only a comparatively short time ago extended as far southward as the mouth of the Strait of Juan de Fuca, probably farther. Mt. Shasta has three glaciers, but Mt. Whitney, although it is the highest mountain in the range, does not now cherish a single glacier. Small patches of lasting snow and ice occur on its northern slopes, but its rivers can imagine themselves on the waters of a large Hudson or Rhine, for the banks of these magnificent streams have nearly all the scenic attractions of the most picturesque of waterways, if we except those that are the result of civilized effort. The forest region up to an elevation of 7000 feet is usually in great part free from snow in June, but during the first five months of the year the higher regions are still heavily-laden, and are not touched by spring weather to any considerable extent before the middle of the latter part of the month of July. The season will be suitable for the expedition.

It is to this region of natural wonders and perilous heights that the two exploring parties are now taking their way. What the results of their labors may be, time only can show, meanwhile their of Philadelphia, is on the way to the country to visit Mount St. Elias, and will ascend that mountain. It is 19,500 feet high and lies in the disputed territory between the United States and British America. The other members of the American party who share the attempt to reach the peaks, are Mr. J. Entekrin, of West Virginia, who was with the Arctic expedition of 1893-4, and E. B. Tatham, of the United States Coast Survey. Prince Luigi will reach San Francisco early this month, where he will take the steamer for Yakutat, from which point he will be taken by boat and sleigh, across the glaciers and mountains to the foot of St. Elias. He will be accompanied by experienced guides, and expects to reach the mountain at the beginning of July. Though the wonders of our American Alps are not known to comparative travelers, owing to the difficulties heretofore attending a tour to these mountains, they are now becoming widely known and appreciated at no distant date. Railroads and other facilities have opened up the way to travel, and the old-time difficulties are fast disappearing. Writing of the mountains of these Western Alps and the glaciers, Mr. John Muir, a recent traveler, says in his book, The Mountains of California:

"Every glacier in the world is smaller in size than the Alps. All the world is growing warmer, or the crop of snow-flowers is diminishing. But in contemplating the Alps, the glaciers of the world, we are struck in mind while trying to account for the changes going on that the same forces that wastes them builds them. Every glacier records the expenditure of an enormous amount of sun-heat in lifting the snow for the snow of which it is made from the ocean to the mountains, as Tyndall strikingly shows.

The number of glaciers in the Alps, according to the Schlegel brothers, is 100, which 100 may be regarded as primary, and the total area of ice, snow, and mit, between 14,000 and 15,000 feet high, is capped with ice, and eight tremendous glaciers, seven to twelve miles long, radiate from it as a centre, and form the sources of the principal streams of the State. The lowest-descending of this fine group flows through beautiful forests to within 3500 feet of the sea-level, and sends forth a river laden with glacier mud and sand. On through British Columbia and southeastern Alaska the broad, sustained mountain chain, extending along the coast, is generally glacier-bearing. The upper branches of nearly all the main canons and fiords are occupied by glaciers, which gradually increase in size, and descend lower until the high region between Mt. Fairweather and Mount St. Elias is reached, where a considerable number discharge into the waters of the ocean. This is pre-eminently the ice-land of Alaska and of the entire Pacific Coast.

"Only one glacier on the coast, observed by Prof. Russell, discharges its bergs directly into the open sea, at Icy Cape, opposite to Mount St. Elias. The southernmost of the glaciers that reach the sea oc-they are shallow, and present no well marked evidence of glacial motion. Its sides, however, are scored and polished in many places by the action of its ancient glaciers that flowed east and west as tributaries of the great glaciers that once filled the valleys of Kern and Owen's rivers.

"The greater portion of the snow deposited around the lofty summits of the range falls in small crisp flakes and broken crystals, or, when accompanied by strong winds and low temperature, the crystals, instead of being locked together in their fall to form tufted flakes, are beaten and broken into meal and fine dust. But down in the forest region the greater portion comes gently to the ground, light and feathery, some of the flakes in mild weather being nearly an inch in diameter, and it is evenly distributed and kept from drifting to any great extent by the shelter afforded by the large trees."

Alaska has the third highest mountain range in the world and its landscapes are of incomparable beauty and grandeur. The climax of its Alpine range is found in the St. Elias group. Travelers sailing up progress will be watched with interest both here and abroad.

With Prince Luigi's party are Vittorio Sella and four Alpine guides, and they will have the co-operation of Messrs. Fay, Davidson and Russell, of the United States Geological Survey, Dr. Vecchi of San Francisco, and Mr. Ingraham of Seattle. Mr. Sella is distinguished as a photographer of mountains, and has probably made the finest views of Alpine summits that have ever been taken. He has ascended the Matterhorn in mid-winter, and it is safe to predict that our views of American mountain scenery will be greatly enriched by his visit. It will be remembered by many that Lieutenant F. Schwatka, the Polar explorer, made an effort to climb Mount St. Elias about eleven years ago, starting from a point near Yakutat. He only reached a height of 7,250 feet, however, the ice barrier beyond that point being impossible to surmount with safety. It is expected that with his experienced guides and proper appliances, Prince Luigi will be able to go much higher, if not to reach the summit itself.

Our photographs on this page show some of these giants of the American Alps. St. Elias is almost continually enveloped in cloud or fog, although at a distance the white cap of the summit may be seen towering toward the sky like a gigantic sentinel. Rainier, with its icy dome and its many dangerous glaciers and crevasses, presents a magnificent appearance in clear weather. Shasta, Hood, and Wrangell are among the other peaks which the adventurous climbers may essay, should their stay be a prolonged one, and the conditions favorable.

A Generous Inscription.

Among the many cases of corn contributed by the people of the West to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's India Relief Fund, is a car given by the citizens of Smith Centre, Kan. On either side, the car has a banner inscribed: "Carload of corn for the starving of India, Mohammedan or atheist. We can feed the world!" The corn will be forwarded on one of the relief ships soon to sail.

The Place of Athletics.

THERE is nothing new in athletics. The Apostle Paul knew about them. He said they profit little. They did not relate to the highest part of our nature. That man was not all chest and legs and arms. That the head counted for something, and the heart counted for more. Innocent, useful, we may readily admit them, if kept in their place. That is the problem, how to keep them in their place. What is their place? Evidently, a secondary and subordinate one. The college yell is not so great an accomplishment as the mastery of the Greek verb, or even a distinction in the different Greek dialects. If ancient literature has sometimes too much dominated college studies, doubtless it is not so any longer. The college athletics are in the ascendant, and the college colors, to use Mr. Webster's phrase, are full high advanced.

THE USE OF ATHLETICS.

If you cannot settle what is virtue according to the utilitarian standard, you can so discuss athletics. When the Apostle Paul affirmed that bodily exercise was not profitable, he used the word relatively. It is good for something, if not the supreme good. It is good for indigestion, it is good to develop muscle, it is good for recreation. Many are the hours in boyhood and youth which have been sweetened on the campus. We well remember pitching quoits, too, and rolling ninepins with men who are now burdened with sundry titles of dignity and honor. But athletics in itself does not make distinguished men. Henry M. Stanley, the great African explorer, said in Lambeth: "Aspiring young Englishmen should think a little less of athletics, and more of acquiring knowledge such as would make them distinguished citizens."

MIND STILL DOMINATES.

Athletic do not prepare for after life, and emmerge in athletics will not count in the average, when the question is asked, what kind of mind, of culture, of acquisitions a candidate has in command. It is urged that the average attainment of a man, even in his intellectual studies, is not what now determines his fitness for places of usefulness and honor. He must know what the average young man does not know must have some specialty beyond the attainment of the average student. And this he cannot secure if he devote his extra time to athletics. Athletics should keep his body sound, his vital organs in good vigor, should make his body fit to do its part in the composite work of body and mind together, which results in good scholarship and large acquisitions. And when athletics demands more, it transcends its sphere.

GOD'S CANDLE-ENDS.

It was a remark originated or often used by the great Baptist preacher, Spurgeon, that God never wastes his candle-ends. It would have been more reverent, perhaps, to have said that the great Master said after he had fed thousands by miracle: "Gather up the fragments that nothing be lost." Gladstone has never achieved his eminence by lifting up the axe against forest trees. Chopping has helped him to longer life and better thinking. But, if he had given his physical strength to chopping, and made his library but an incident, there would have been no intellectual eminence for him. He has never wasted his candle-ends. He has gathered up the fragments. The man who aspires to athletic success must make this first and supreme. He must eat, drink, wake, sleep according to rule. And the regimen adopted must look first to the body.

WHEN SHOULD THE ATHLETIC VOGUE BE DROPPED.

It must be dropped, in order to after success. Cricket, foot-ball, running, rowing, leaping, cannot be always supreme. When life begins in earnest, when clients have to be sought and served, when patients have to be attended, when sermons have to be preached, when legislative halls have to be frequented; in a word, when life's burdens and responsibilities have to be assumed, then athletics, cycle-matches, foot-ball games, lawn tennis, golf, have to be remanded to an inferior place. He must say: "Get thee behind me, Satan!" He may have his holidays for such sport. But if he give to them solid hours every day, they will soon tell upon his professional attainments, and the non-athletic, or the man who uses but does not abuse athletics, will soon outdistance him in life's race.

AFTER-LIFE FAILURES.

It is true that a few young men who have been a success on the triangle, or in boating, have also had brains enough and mental alertness enough to attain a fair degree of success in literary or educational competitions. But the exception only proves the rule to be otherwise. Such young men are picked up at once and set into chairs where their athletic successes will count for the building up of an institution, and where their example may seem to teach what is not the real fact, that professional athletics pays. For incidental athletics, athletics for the sake of temporary and irregular recreation is one thing, and athletics systematically and persistently pursued is another. A young man, whether in college or in afterlife, must make scholarship, practical knowledge the first thing, or he will soon fall out of the ranks and drop to the rear. And athletics may do it as really as indolence.

The Agreement to Differ.

IT is easy to agree to agree. It takes no effort. It is sometimes one's duty to agree to differ. As to many points, America and England are of the same opinion, stand for the same thing among the nations. Really the points of difference between them are often only nominal. As to freedom, the United States with her President, elected by the people, is scarcely better off than Great Britain with her constitutional monarchy. The two nations stand for the rights of man the world over. This is the meaning of the Red, White, and Blue, and of the Cross of St. George. They should never be unfurled against each other. This is just as true of individuals. Because two public officials differ as to what is expedient as to tariff or currency, they need not always be at cross purposes as to international questions. The nation has a right to public servants that agree.

Our Brother's Keeper.

Altruism an Essential Principle of Christianity Affecting Social Problems, Especially Temperance.

Of all the wrong ideas that can get into the mind of a human being, none is more discreditable to him than the notion that a popular preacher has called "the heresy of Cain." Every man, and especially every Christian, is in a certain sense his brother's keeper. He is bound to see to it that by no action of his is his brother injured, and that he neglect no opportunity of doing his brother a service. The essential spirit of Christianity, reiterated by our Lord in many ways, is opposed to the selfish indifference which regards a brother's welfare as no matter of personal concern. Common humanity would condemn a man who saw another asleep on a railroad track, if he made no effort to save him. No words of condemnation are too strong to apply to a ship's captain who sails heedlessly away from a sinking ship. We expect, and we feel we have a right to expect, that help be rendered to one in need. Every man has a claim on every other for assistance in a peril, or a calamity. We recognize this duty in cases of physical emergency, and there is no reason why it should not rule in cases of moral and spiritual danger. "It is no concern of mine," one might say. "Is it not? Then we are not made in the likeness of God. The higher nature in man demands that we make our brother's welfare a matter of personal concern. No matter if he is bent on moral suicide, if he will deserve all the evil that his course will bring upon him, we are bound to do all that lies in our power to save him from his doom. Christ's parable of the good Samaritan presents the situation in its extreme points. The victim a man who was not even of his own race, but of a race noted for its arrogance and pride. Surely the Samaritan might be justified in leaving him to shift for himself. But he cares for him, walks that the other may ride, pays money for him, and pledges his own credit for the other's support, and our Lord endorses the picture, "Go thou and do likewise."

If this principle of concern for the welfare of others ever became the ruling principle in the life of every Christian, the cause of Christ would be advanced beyond our conception. The Church would then become indeed the light of the world. The social problems which now perplex the world would be solved, and men would learn what Christ really came to teach. The drink problem, which is the one specially designated for consideration, is only one of the many awaiting the Church's solution. That it is a fair specimen of the others, may be admitted, and it is the one that presses most urgently for attention. Already much has been done, but the evil is so stupendous and so widespread that it almost produces despair. It needs to be considered in all its aspects, and deserves all the intelligence and all the strategic skill the Church can bring to bear upon it. How to help the victims to emancipation; how to protect them from temptation and how to prevent the innocent falling into the toils—all these problems the Church ought to make its concern. We are often told that total abstinence is nowhere enjoined in the Bible, and that therefore the Church has no right to meddle in the matter. But any evil that is demoralizing the race is distinctly within the Church's jurisdiction, and if total abstinence is not explicitly enjoined in the Bible, the principles on which it is based are emphatically enunciated. In this matter the Christian is surely his brother's keeper. He is bound to recognize the existence of the propensity, which has to be overcome. How can he help him? First of all, his own example should be set. For the sake of the children, any of whom may be afflicted with the taint, the Christian ought to abstain, so that those who love and respect him may be encouraged to take the safe path. His influence ought also to be exerted toward removing from the weak the ostentatious temptation which invites him at the street corner, and so protecting his weak brother from the allurements. Not until the Church takes its stand resolutely in this matter, and every Christian is a declared enemy of intoxicating liquor, will the evil be removed.

American Congratulations.

ALTHOUGH no precedent could be found in the State Department at Washington, for the appointment of a special Ambassador to represent the United States at the celebration of the sixtieth year of Queen Victoria's reign, President McKinley has made the appointment. The Hon. Whitelaw Reid will go to England as the bearer of a personal letter from the President to the Queen and will participate in the ceremonies described in the journal last week. His official title, "Special Ambassador on Special Mission." It was suggested that Mr. Hay, our regularly accredited ambassador at the English court, might regard Mr. Reid's appointment as a slight, but on consultation, Mr. Hay gave so cordial welcome to the proposal, that the President had no scruples about commissioning Mr. Reid. Similar appointments are being made by civilized nations the world over, and sending most distinguished men as their representatives. There is a general disposition, based on mutual esteem, to make the occasion one of cordial, international congratulation. The aged monarch has won the respect of the world, by her blameless life and her kindly, dignified courtesy. Her personal influence has always exerted on the side of peace and righteousness and has had more weight than is generally given to it. We as a nation cannot forget that in 1861, when the relations between our government and England were strained to a degree that appeared to render war inevitable, it was the Queen who opened the way to a peaceable and honorable settlement, by forcing her Secretary of State, against his will, to retract from his dispatches to Washington the offensive phrases which would have inflamed popular resentment, and to substitute respectful and conciliatory words instead. The natural development of popular power in England has curtailed and restricted her power, but she has used the prerogative remaining to her for the good of her people. The condition of public morals at the beginning of her reign, was at its lowest, as a result of the example of her dissolute uncle, George IV., and her imbecile predecessor, William IV.; but the Queen's beautiful home life and her unsurpassed personal character exerted a beneficent influence which raised the tone of morality and purified her people. It is eminently proper, therefore, that the people of her realms, should honor her and should make the sixtieth anniversary of her accession an occasion of national rejoicing and that other nations should tender their congratulations. It is significant that while the power of the people has immensely increased, there has been a time when loyalty to the monarch was more genuine and enthusiastic and this is due to the Queen's personal character. She is experiencing the truth of the old saying: "The throne is established by righteousness." (Prov. 16: 12.)

To recover a Gift. A quarrel of two ladies involved an action in the Supreme Court of New York which is now waiting the decision of the court. It appears that twelve years ago, one of the ladies was engaged as a companion to the other and that a warm friendship sprang up between them. They became inseparable living together in this country and abroad. As payment for her services, the companion at first received fifty dollars a month, but subsequently the amount of compensation was doubled. Her association with her friend and mistress was not agreeable to the family of the latter, and several attempts were made to separate them. According to the story of the companion, her friend, wishing to provide for her in the event of her own death, gave her bonds of the value of $25,000, which were deposited in a bank to her credit, and the income of them was paid to her. The other lady's story is that, the income of the bonds was to be paid to her companion during her pleasure, but she retained the ownership and intended to leave them to her by will for her life. A few months ago a quarrel occurred between them and the companion was required to give up the bonds. This she declined to do, as she insisted lady with whom she went to Australia. There she married a retired ship-master who had a large fortune. Shortly afterwards she reimbursed her friend, the farm-hand, with the money he had given her, and he heard no more of her. But a few days ago, he received notice from her lawyers that she was dead, and that he was a beneficiary under her will. She had bequeathed him seventy-three thousand dollars in token of her gratitude for the timely service which he rendered her in her time of sickness and poverty fifteen years previously. The man was astonished. He supposed that when his gift was returned, he had received all the repayment he would have, and it was more than he expected; but he had not taken into account the gratitude his friend felt. There will be similar surprise in the day of final reward when Christ recalls services done by his children which they have forgotten.

Then shall the righteous answer him saying, Lord, when saw we thee a-hungred and fed thee? (Matt. 25: 37.)

A Precious Manuscript.

Formal presentation was made to the State of Massachusetts on May 26, by ex-Ambassador Bayard, of Governor Bradford's manuscript history of the Mayflower immigration, which he had succeeded in obtaining in England. A joint convention of the two Houses of the Legislature was held to receive the precious document and Governor Wolcott attended to accept it on behalf of the State. Senator Hoar described the search that had been made as chief of the little colony made him acquainted with them all, is a treasure beyond price. Its value is fully appreciated and there is little likelihood of it again being lost. If the writer could have foreseen how the great nation which has grown from that small and painful beginning would have treasured his manuscript, he would surely have rejoiced; but what would have pleased the godly man best would be to see the nation learning from his record the lessons which Moses drew from a history that resembled it in many particulars:

Hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand? Unto thee it was showed that thou mightest know that the Lord he is God; there is none else beside him. (Deut. 4: 34.)

Ten of a Family Drowned.

A curious series of fatalities has come to light in connection with the finding in the river off Randall's Island, N. Y., recently, of the dead body of a man. When his body was taken home his wife declared that his drowning was the fulfilment of a prediction he had often made that he would die in the water. Nine members of his family had previously met their death in the same way. His father, mother, and three children went down with a vessel which sank while crossing the English Channel some years ago. Shortly afterwards a brother was drowned in the East, and five years after that another brother found a watery grave off the Pacific coast. Seven years ago his two sons were drowned in Tremont while outrowing. The man became depressed by this series of bereavements, and frequently said that drowning was the fate of his family, and that he would not be able to escape it; but the premonition did not keep him from the river which seemed to have an irresistible fascination for him. He hired a boat on May 23d and went out for a row. It is supposed he was standing and fell overboard, as the boat drifted ashore right side up. He was foreman of a manufacturing business in New York, and was considered a very capable, efficient workman. It is strange that the premonition of drowning should have had no practical effect upon him. The coincidence in the deaths of his relatives was very slender ground for him to expect such a death for himself, but as he did draw that inference, we might have expected that he would have been careful to avoid that form of danger. Yet the same perversity is often witnessed in spiritual matters. We see the same propensity showing itself in one generation of a family after another, and one following another by the same road to ruin. The appeal of the inspired writer still needs to be uttered: Let us lay aside every weight and the sin which doth so easily beset us. (Heb. 12: 1.)

A Spider's Nest.

A remarkable exhibition of maternal instinct in a spider is described in Pearls and Pebbles by Mrs. Traill. The author was wandering one morning by the shore of a Canadian lake, when she noticed in a bush a curious ball of yellowish silk. It was about the size of a pigeon's egg and was held in place by a number of fine lines. On Mrs. Traill's touching one of the lines, dozens of small spiders rushed out from the ball, and from the bottom of the bush, to which several of the threads were attached, came a large black spider. Up she hurried to the rescue of her brood. Examining the lines and finding nothing injured, she apparently ordered the frightened little ones back to their cradle-bed. As soon as she saw them safely housed she retired to her post at the foot of the bush. Again Mrs. Traill touched one of the strings; the little spiders again ran out, and up came the mother, angry at being annoyed, but anxious to see what caused the vibration. Close observation showed Mrs. Traill that a thread was attached to each of the little spiders and fastened to the centre of the web, and thus the mother knew of anything that agitated her brood. We are assured that He who endowed his creatures with such marvelous skill, exercises similar care in the protection of his children and that all their perils and dangers are known to him: He that toucheth you, toucheth the apple of his eye. (Zech. 2: 8.)

that they had been given to her absolutely. It will be for the court to decide which of the two ladies is right in her contention, but it is very clear that if permission is given, the gift will be withdrawn. There are some desponding Christians who entertain fears that God will deal so with them, and they sorrowfully admit that their lives have given him cause to do so. But they need be under no apprehension. He is a God that forgives the sins of his children when they love him and trust in him, and as to his gifts, we are authoritatively assured that The gifts and calling of God are without repentance. (Rom. 11: 29.)

Unexpectedly Rewarded.

A farm-hand in California has just received notice of the acquisition of a fortune. It comes from a woman whom he befriended in San Francisco fifteen years ago. He was at that time working on an estate at Milbrae. He became acquainted with one of the housemaids in a neighboring mansion and the two became warm friends. The housemaid fell ill and lost her situation. She was in an almost destitute condition and her sickness grew very serious. The young man took an interest in her and finally gave her all his savings which amounted to two hundred dollars. She recovered her health and secured a position as nurse to a wealthy for the manuscript, which was known to be in existence, but which had mysteriously disappeared from Boston in 1767. The finding of it in the Library of the Bishop of London at Fulham was described and the efforts that had been made to gain possession of it. Mr. Bayard related his own experience in negotiating for its return, and the series of consultations with the Queen and the Archbishop of Canterbury which were necessary to it. He concluded by handing the historic relic to the Governor, who promised that it should be safely guarded for all time. An interesting incident of the ceremony was that State Senator Bradford, a lineal descendant of the author of the manuscript, moved the vote of thanks of the Legislature to Mr. Bayard for his exertions in securing it. The manuscript is entirely in the handwriting of Governor Bradford, and contains the story of the enterprise from its inception in 1620 to the end of 1647. The Governor describes in detail the sailing of the Mayflower, the mid-winter voyage, the compact on shipboard, the landing on Plymouth Rock, and the terrible sufferings of those years of famine and perils from wild beasts and still more savage men, which carried more than half their number into the graveyard. The original record of these anxieties and privations and sorrows, set down by the man whose official position

THE WELLS OF THE EAST.

They are Everywhere Regarded as a Priceless Possession—The Quaint "Shadoofs" that are used in Egypt.

PEOPLE who live in temperate climates, where there is an abundant water supply, have often been surprised, on traveling in Eastern lands, to find that wells are there regarded as among the most valuable of possessions. This is really the case in Egypt, Syria, India, Arabia, and throughout Asia generally. A natural spring or fountain, an ever-flowing brook or a well, sunk with infinite labor and surrounded by heavy masonry on all sides, is held as a treasure of which any family or community might be proud. Some of the Eastern wells are very ancient, and the remains of a few of the oldest (some of them mentioned in Scripture), are still shown to this day. In localities where the dry season is a protracted one, villages are usually built near a spring or well, in order that the people may be conveniently close to the water. In the evenings, the women, with their water pitchers balanced on their heads, crowd around the stone steps leading down to the well, where they let down their jars by a rope if the well be deep, or dip them into it, if it be shallow. The stone tops of the older wells are worn in grooves three or four inches deep by the long centuries of friction, caused by the ropes being let down over their edges.

Instead of drawing up the water by means of ropes, some of the wells have the "shadoof," one long pole set in the crotch of another, and worked as a sweep. At one end of the swinging pole a rope and bucket are fastened, and on the other end is a balance, or weight. Some of the old farm houses in our own country use a modification of the Egyptian "shadoof." Our photograph on this page, taken recently by a visitor to Egypt, shows the "shadoof" in operation, and its resemblance to some of the familiar contrivances in our own rural districts is quite striking. It consists simply of a lever moving on a pivot, which is loaded at one end with a lump of clay or some such weight, and has a pail or pucket at the other. It is probably the most picturesque, as it is the oldest kind of draw-well in use at the present day.

Victoria and the Children.

The aged Queen of Great Britain, whose sixtieth royal anniversary is to be celebrated this month, is very fond of the society of children. It is related that one day she was out driving in Scotland, when she saw three little girls, who lived at the same parsonage, thoroughly enjoying themselves at a good game. She sent a messenger to make inquiries about them, and desired that they should come and visit her at Balmoral Castle. It so happened that their parents were not at home at the time, and, although they were in high glee, the children did not quite know what to do. One point which troubled them very much, was how they should address the Queen. However, after a little talk, they decided they could not do better than address her as the kings of old were addressed in the Bible. When they were taken into her majesty's presence, to the Queen's great amazement they fell immediately down before her and very solemnly exclaimed: "O Queen, live for ever!" They spent a delightful afternoon, and all too soon the time arrived for them to go home. Imagine the Queen's surprise and amusement when, on leaving, they again fell down together and said, this time, "O Queen, live for ever! And please may we come again another day?"

Japanese Babies.

There are few prettier dresses for children anywhere than those that are worn by the babies of Japan. They all wear a flowing garment called the "kimono," open in front, with wide sleeves, very much like a dressing-gown, which, as it has no buttons, is tied on by means of a long sash wound several times round the waist. The "kimono" is so loose that the baby can be tucked inside and tied on with the sash, and thus he is carried around, peering curiously with his bright black eyes over his sister's shoulder at the great new world. Asleep, his little shaven head bobs helplessly around, and the sun beats on his upturned face. His little body is entirely covered by the "kimono," and the children, when they are carrying their small brothers and sisters, look as though they were two-headed. But they play tag and prisoner's base, and fly kites, and play ball just the same, whether they carry the baby or not. And he seems to enjoy it, too, for he hardly ever cries, but when the game is especially lively he will laugh and crow as though he understood it all.

The Care of the Children.

One of the most interesting among the many addresses delivered at the recent Mothers' Congress in Washington, D. C., was that of Mrs. Mary Lowe Dickinson, who spoke of the inheritance of the children of to-day. In the course of her remarks she said:

"As mothers especially who would fain see better things in the future that is to be the inheritance of our children, we rejoice in the fact that never before was a time when, at the heart of every movement, large or small, lay such consideration for the welfare of human beings as to-day. Never before was so much strength, time, and money expended in the education of the illiterate. Never before were there such wise and wonderful projects for preventing pauperism and disease. Amid the maze of manifold theories and schemes for human betterment, the idea has been growing that the answer to the growing problems of the race lies in the conditions and possible development of the childhood of the race. Every organization and every institution has begun to give its share of attention to the development of the child. Yet it has remained for this new society to 'take the child and set him in the midst,' making him, who is already the centre of love, the centre of strong endeavor, the key to the closed gates of our highest progress, the heart and soul of our hope; that the world, becoming as a little child, may yet enter the kingdom of God."

Literary Taste in Children.

Parents should strive, by every means in their power, to kindle in the hearts of their children the love of good books. It is difficult to properly estimate the value, to a child, of the companionship of really good, instructive, elevating, entertaining literature. The lack of such companionship, especially in these days of cheap printing, is a great deprivation. Says a thoughtful writer: "Boys and girls who become fond of good books, and who are trained to know and love the best writers early in childhood, thereby secure an immunity against forms of gross temptation, and an impulse toward noble living which become of immeasurable worth in the struggles of later years. Love for good

A PLEA FOR THE CHILDREN.

'TIS a glorious day in the month of June. The atmosphere seemingly all in bloom. With nature's own music, sweet to the ears. The songs of the birds, telling of cheer and hopes for a bountiful harvest this year. All hail to the month of June!

'Tis a beautiful spot in the month of June. With daisies and buttercups all in bloom. Nodding their heads in the balmy air. Waiting for little hands, coming to share the glories of nature. Oh, so fair. In this beautiful month of June!

Waiting for little hands—shall they come. Out of the city's noise and hum, Out of the tenements dark and drear Into the sunshine? Oh, how dear To the childish heart is this month of June! This beautiful month of June!

Dear friends, who are blest with your own little nest

Where sunshine and light have full sway Oh, do what you can, to send some little maid for a ten-days' stay Where the grand old Hudson winds its way In this beautiful month of June.

"VICEROY LI'S LITTLE PET."

THIS is the name by which a Chinese Christian girl, Margaret Whong, is known to her friends at home, and how she came by it makes an interesting story. She visited America some time ago with friends, and turning found that the great Viceroy Hung Chang, was her fellow-passenger. He sent for the Chinese girl, and the result of this acquaintance is plainly told by Marguerite in a letter to the Missionary Friend:

"To-day such a wonderful thing happened. How I wished for you who great man Li walked past your little and looked at her with a real grand expression. Immediately afterwards sent his interpreter to inquire who I was where I came from, how long I have been abroad, what school I enter, etc. We talked in English, as he could not talk dialect. When we came before him he knelt down real low, but the dear man rose from his seat, come and assist us and he want to shake hands with me as we did. We sat down and he asked me all about the family from my father down to little Sa Muoi. He asked me how I am, and who is my English teacher. After many more questions Li wished to appoint me to represent dear China in the World's Congress of Representative Women to be held in London in 1898. Just think of it! I thought Chinese government shall ever have anything to do with women; and soon this new way is opened for poor women and girls of my country accounted side by side with men. His Excellency commanded me to learn English thoroughly and keep on with my English also, because he desires me to go to Peking and see him before starting for London in 1898; also when we come we must carry the report to him our views and he will also present us to the Emperor of China.

"I trust our Father for all things; and this also. Oh, in some way you must help me! I know our work is getting greater and greater so we, you and I together must work to save this poor lost land and by and by when we are thrown into this world, we will go to see our Heavenly Father, who is Lord of lords and King of kings, and hand-and-hand report our work before his throne. We are going to help save China, and so it is his will to make Li notice and have something to say to your loving little girl, Margaret Whong."

Improper Pets.

Don't allow your children pets too soon, writes Margaret Beebe, the famous dergartner, at least not until they are old enough to treat them properly. Do not let a three-year-old a kitten to maul or to tease. Give him a bird or a fish he cannot handle. If a child is too little to handle, he can be taught tenderness by having the inaccessible ones substituted better than by depriving him of all and all opportunity for the exercise of gentler traits of character. If a child is allowed to have a pet he should be taught how to take care of it.

The Oldest Rosebush in the World.

There is a famous rosebush at Hildesheim, in Hanover, which is said to be the oldest on the globe. Mrs. Sophie Drumm, writing about it in The Mayflower, says: "This wonderfully old rosebush has grown to a tree, growing from the soil under the surface earth of the Church of the Cemetery. The original stem is dead but new stems have worked through small openings in the wall and have grown so as to almost cover the entire church for a width and height of forty feet. Tradition states this rosebush was planted by Charlemagne in 833 A.D. The Church of the Cemetery was burned during the eleventh century but the fire did not destroy the roots as they continued to grow in the subsoil. A writer in 1673 has mentioned this oldest rosebush in one of his works. It is also mentioned in a poem written in 1690."

THE MODERN JEW IN HIS ANCESTRAL HOME

BY HON. SELAH MERRILL D.D. L.L.D.

JERUSALEM A CITY OF FESTIVALS.

The Great Mohammedan Festival of Neby Mousa—A Whole City makes a mistake who speaks of Jerusalem as a poor city. It has no manufactures or signs of prosperity. It has no families of wealth. Both Government and people are poor and it is a fact that a great majority of its inhabitants are poorly dressed while a large number of them are clothed in rags.

The houses and their furnishings, the buildings except those built by the stores and shops, the streets with the animals, horses, donkeys, all look poverty stricken. The city made upon a stranger by these signs of impoverishment and poverty is far from pleasant.

On the other hand Jerusalem, if it is anything else, is rich in festivities. In respect it is the equal of any city on the globe. Poor music, poor dances, all sorts of processions, and a long inharmonious clang of bells is heard throughout the year. The great feast days recurring by they do would satiate the public who should suppose till at last the of them would cease. But the inhabitants of Jerusalem are made of sterner stuff—their zeal for festivals is insatiable. After one is past they hail with demonstrative joy, and devotedly to its pleasures as heartily as they. There is much bigotry, and frequently quarrels arise over religious questions, but in the matter of observance of feast days there is less selfishness than a stranger would suppose. By their actions the inhabitants seem to declare their belief that the feast is something to be shared by all things are less in harmony for example, Christianity and Mo-hammedanism, yet the gala scenes of the Feast of Tabernacles are witnessed with pleasure by thousands of Moslems, while the Feast of Neby Mousa
(the prophet Moses) attracts as eager a half the population of the city as the religious distinctions.

Of a million inhabitants the city is crowded with which Jerusalem might not be equally considered. It is necessary to remember that the Holy City is a small place containing less than fifty thousand souls, and it is not remarkable that festivals are so numerous should have great interest. A person new to the city might easily be led to judge as one does at Athens, that the city was given up to religious ceremonies. The inhabitants are divided into four sections, not by politics, education, race, or color, but by religion, which are, to mention them in historic order, the Jewish, the Christian, and the Mohammedan.

Between the last two sections there is the greatest rivalry as to which of the festivals just mentioned, Easter or Neby Mousa, shall outshine the other. Nothing that is done, however, is done under the head of rivalry; the leaders are too politic for that; still, lavish effort is made to attract public attention and the Oriental vision is dazzled first by one and then by the other of these annual spectacles. It is difficult to decide which is the more imposing and gorgeous. Easter appeals to one set of emotions and Neby Mousa to another.

As this festival occurs always at or near the time of Easter, the suspicion is not groundless that it was designed to counteract the Christian feast. The Tomb of Moses which is visited on this occasion is about four hours walk from Jerusalem, but it is only a small, quiet, orderly company that accomplishes the entire journey, the astonishing display is made on the day when the procession leaves the city.

I have asked their wise men why the Tomb of Moses was on the west of the Jordan? They reply, "We know very well that Moses died and was buried on the east of the Jordan, but it is far more convenient for the pilgrims to have his tomb on this side of the river." Hence its present location, not very far southeast of the Holy City amid barren and lonely mountains.

This festival occurs in the most beautiful month of the year when the air is de-however, this sacred place is closed against "the infidels." Warnings are sent out officially and every Consul must notify his people that during this period they must not intrude upon the ceremonies of the place nor even attempt to enter it.

Should they attempt to do this they would be received with genuine Turkish toleration, namely, daggers and death. Sometimes I have known of parties who had come thousands of miles to visit this mosque, who were to arrive the evening of the day when it was to close, they knot knowing that it would close, and I have sent fleet mounted messengers to them that they must hurry on with all speed, for if they could arrive one or two hours before sunset it would be their only opportunity of visiting this wonderfully beautiful structure. Friday is the great day, because the procession starts then for Neby Mousa. Services are held in the mosque, and at noon the signal gun announces that all is ready, and the movement begins.
Outside the gate, crowds have since early morning, massed themselves so that the slope from the eastern wall down to the bottom of the valley where Gethsemane is, and thence along the Bethany road for half a mile, is covered with human beings.
All the gala dresses in the city are worn on this occasion. The section of the hillside north of the road leading to the valley is reserved for the Mohammedan women. The Governor and all the city officials are there; also many dignified Moslems with green turbans, signifying thus that they are of the family of the prophet. Numbers of half-naked Cervishes

GREEK FEAST OF THE ASSUMPTION.
PROCESSION TO THE RUSSIAN CHURCH ON MOUNT OF OLIVES.

Small booths are erected where coffee and other simple drinks are sold. A multitude of torches and lanterns light up the valley at night and give it a strange and weird appearance. The military band is there and furnishes music in abundance of their peculiar sort. There is a guard of soldiers in attendance which is frequently changed, for it is understood that both officers and men while preserving order, share in the festivities of the occasion, which they thoroughly enjoy, and it is not considered fair that these peculiar blessings should fall to the lot of one set alone.
There is not that strict separation of the sexes which is such a prominent feature of the Neby Mousa feast, but on the contrary entire families and their many friends meet together for genuine social recreation. The city is so near that food is carried from home, and hence little cooking is done upon the ground. Multitudes of visitors are attracted hither from all the region about, and these holiday lovers, men, women, and children, old and young, greet each other, sing, eat, sleep, talk, and sit—an important item in an Oriental's idea of diversion—and in their estimation the days and nights pass delightfully away.
The Virgin is seldom thought of; this is an annual festival for pleasure heartily enjoyed by everybody, and not by one class or sect alone.

Turning next to the Jews, who number something more than one-half the population of the city, their Feast of Tabernacles is certainly to be mentioned foremost as the one in which Jerusalem takes special pride. This Feast has come down from the ages, and modern Jews throw themselves into the celebration of it as heartily as did their ancestors centuries ago.
It comes at the end of harvest, and is therefore a feast of thanksgiving for the bounties of the year, although comparatively few Jews are tillers of the soil. It is a feast of joy when faces that were sad with anxiety look happy once more, and families that were burdened with poverty try to put on the appearance of plenty.
Houses are cleaned, booths are erected of reeds and made neat and attractive, the best clothing that one can command is worn, work is laid aside, pleasant words are spoken—it is a time of gladness and rejoicing. The Jews have not the political power which Mohammedans and Christians have, their public buildings are of a humbler sort, the great majority of their people are poor, they have no control of holy places, the nature of their festival does not call for processions and pomp, and there may be other reasons why this Feast should not absorb public attention to the degree of some of the other of the great feasts of Jerusalem. Yet it is a delightful occasion when the old, sad city wakes to quiet mirth and song, and a great multitude of men and women who were depressed and downcast, look up with hope and cheer. This feast continues for eight days, and must seriously affect their business; yet the Jews welcome its approach.
In a future letter I will discuss the funeral customs of Jerusalem.

THE "NEBY MOUSA" PROCESSION CROSSING THE KEDRON.

lightful and the earth is carpeted with flowers. The people of the villages far and near are impatient for this Holy Week to arrive. Group after group is seen making its way to Jerusalem; these are joined by fellow believers who have come from distant cities, and together with banners that have done service for generations and the noise of many small rude drums they enter the gate of the city. The narrow streets become more and more crowded, so that it is almost impossible to pass through them, to say nothing of its being unsafe. Fewer Jews than usual are seen, and Christians incline to seclude themselves as a measure of precaution, but everywhere are the white turbans of "The Faithful."

Throughout the year the Mosque of Omar is open to Christians to visit if they are provided with the proper Consular permits. During the week of this festival gesticulate, contort their bodies, beat their heads, cut their cheeks or arms, chew thorns, tread upon knives, and perform many other fanatical feats for the purpose of astonishing the spectators. It is a modest estimate to say that ten thousand people witness this procession every year.

For display there is nothing else to compare with it in all the life of Jerusalem.
Certainly the followers of the prophet are marching forth in triumph.

After the festival of Neby Mousa the most brilliant display is at the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin, as celebrated by the Greeks. This occurs on the fifteenth of August, according to the Gregorian calendar. Numerous tents are pitched in the Valley of Jehoshaphat and among the groves on the slope of Olivet.
The weather at this season is so warm that many persons make their beds under the trees and have no other covering

ARMENIAN AID.

Dr. Cochran, the American Medical Missionary, writes of Relief and Evangelistic Work on the Border.

ARMENIAN MOTHER AND DAUGHTER.

SOMETIME ago, when the suffering among the Armenian exiles was at its height, and when thousands of them had fled across the mountains to Persia, the sum of $1,000 was sent from our Armenian Relief Fund to Dr. J. P. Cochran, the well-known American physician in Oroomiah, to be used in aiding the destitute refugees. It was the means, in the hands of the worthy doctor and his Christian associates of doing much good among the persecuted people. By a late mail, Dr. Cochran sends us a most interesting letter on the general relief work and also concerning the evangelistic work in which he has been engaged. He writes:

This winter has been a peculiarly trying one in some respects, while in others we have been very abundantly blessed and take much courage. Since early in the fall large numbers of refugees from Turkey found their way down here. Driven from their homes by hunger and general destitution, they came here to get security and to find the chance of earning or begging a support. In response to appeals to England and America quite a sum of money was sent to us to distribute to these poor people. Many were given passports and road expenses to enable them to go to Russia to get work or to beg, while their families stayed here. Food, clothing, and bedding were given to those for whom no work could be found.

I inclose a report of the evangelistic work in our field in this part of Persia. The larger part of our field is in Turkey among the semi-independent tribes (Nestorian). The last two years we have been unable to do much for them personally, owing to the disturbed condition of Turkey. We have some dozen or more natives at work there, however. Here in Oroomiah, as you may be aware, the work has long been established under our Board. We have the work in the villages well organized, with village and intermediate schools which feed the college and female seminary. We have a printing-press for our text-books and for a paper and other publications. We have a hospital and dispensaries. Ours is the only hospital this side of Teheran, the capital. We have just been cabled that our appropriations are cut $5,000. To have this come when we always make out our estimates as low as possible seems like a death-blow. We will have to close the press almost wholly; the female seminary, the college, the village schools must be shut up, the hospital will have to be closed, and it will only then be possible to meet this heavy cut.

In the Oroomiah and Sulduz plains and the Fergawer Valley, there are thirty-nine organized churches, including under their care over one hundred and twenty villages. The force at work consists of twenty-four ordained pastors, twenty-three licentiates, and five evangelists, together with the two missionary superintendents, Messrs. Coan and Laharee. The outlook before the winter set in was not encouraging, but after three months of untiring, unremitting work, the report of all the helpers is that at no time in the history of Oroomiah have we had cause for so much encouragement and gratitude to God in the remarkable spiritual awakening all over the plain. Daily prayer meetings in the station have been kept up all winter, where the work in the villages has been a special theme for united prayer, and more than one instance have there been signal answers to the prayers offered. The bishop and priests of the Old Church, as well as the Armenian clergy, in some places have admitted their helplessness at the stupor of the congregations to their services, while in other places they have given their people permission to attend these meetings, saying: "It is the word of God, go and hear it if you will." It behooves us as never before to push on and to enter every open door.

Letters from missionaries in Armenia continue to give encouraging reports of the rescue work among the orphan children. At several stations special efforts are also being made in behalf of the Armenian widows, thousands of whom are still wholly dependent upon the industrial departments of the relief work for their support.

THE NEW MODERATOR.

The Presbyterian General Assembly Elects Dr. Sheldon Jackson Moderator.

S announced in this journal several weeks ago, a large number of delegates to the General Assembly went to Eagle Lake, Ind., intending to give the highest honor in the church to the distinguished missionary, whose portrait appears in this column. It was felt that the services he had rendered to the Church,

his heroic life and his sublime consecration entitled him to this distinction, and when his name was presented to the Assembly, the eminent fitness of the act commended itself at once to the delegates. The other candidates for the honor were Prof. Henry C. Minton, of San Francisco, and Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, of Philadelphia. The latter gentleman retired from the contest and Dr. Jackson was elected by a vote of 313 to 238.

Dr. Spining who supported the nomination of Dr. Jackson, made a characteristic speech on the merits of his candidate. He related a dream of meeting on the floor of the Assembly a venerable stranger, whose face and form bore marks of hardship and privation and the sufferings of many weary missionary journeys. Inquiring as to the identity of the distinguished visitor, he learned that he was no other than the great Apostle to the Gentiles. With the strange inconsistency of the dreamer, he was not at all surprised to find him there and offered his services as a guide. He would introduce him to the great lights of the Assembly. First of all Paul must see Gen. Harrison the distinguished elder, famous in religion as in law and politics, but Paul said he would be glad to see him later. There was some one else whom he wanted to see first. It must be John Wanamaker, the dreamer suggested, the millionaire elder famous as donor, as merchant and as Sunday School Superintendent; but Paul, though he had heard of him, was not in so much of a hurry to see him as the man whose career resembled his own. Then it must be Governor Mount of Indiana, or Darwin R. James for whom the Apostle was looking. But it appeared that it was none of these good men, all of whom Paul would like to see after he had satisfied his curiosity about one other, the brave man who had faced snow and ice and a thermometer forty degrees below zero and had traveled on Indian ponies and on foot six hundred thousand miles to preach the Gospel to men who could be reached in no other way. The man who did that was the one in whom Paul was interested and whom he wanted to meet. So Dr. Spining, in his dream, went among the crowd of ministers and distinguished laymen to find Sheldon Jackson that he might satisfy the great Apostle. At last he was found and the dreamer heard the Apostle say as he greeted the missionary: "Why, Brother Jackson, you are no taller than I am! I suppose the reason we are both so small is that we can be more useful under trying circumstances." This vivid suggestion impressed the Assembly and the delegates who, like the Apostle in the speaker's dream, wished to see the missionary of the snows put him by their votes in the place where he could be seen of all and gave him the honor he so richly deserved.

Dr. J. G. CONNER, IONIA, MICH.

Dear Sirs:—An old friend handed me a couple of small vials of Tartaralithine some time ago and on myself, having suffered from rheumatism for several years. I was so pleased with its effects that I cured a full sized bottle, and since it I have been entirely free from rheumatism during the past year. I observed that it is not surpassed by other preparation as a powerful, efficient diuretic; besides it is a 'minister. Please send me a bottle for use among my patients with Rheumatism.

"Because you have not considered the brutalities inflicted upon animals in passion, in deliberate revenge, in unprovoked love of tormenting, in barbarous carelessness of all their needs and pain. Think what they suffer from people whose business it is to take them to slaughter. Think of their slow deaths by compulsory labor beyond their power. Think of what they suffer from hunger and thirst, from cold and from heat. Think of how they are mangled for what is called 'science,' worse still, for what is called 'sport.' Think of the docked horses, and of horses uselessly tortured by the bearing rein! Yet men, calling themselves 'gentle' men, ride behind these suffering animals without one qualm of conscience, or one feeling of shame."

"Don't get into a passion, Steve."

"I do well to get into a passion, John. I have thrashed a good many men and boys for brutality to animals and birds. I consider these thrashings the finest actions of my life. Oh John, if I had your tongue! If I had the tongues of angels! I would go through the length and breadth of the land, and preach to men and to women and to children from this text, 'Am I not a beast and a brother?'"

"I will admit that Christianity has not made this subject of sufficient importance."

"And this omission is, and has been, ever the weak spot in Christianity. Celsus, eighteen centuries ago, brought this charge against it. Priests were accustomed to turn shrines into shambles. Long after Rome was Christianized, the most brutal and degrading combats between men and beasts continued; and we not put a stop to until the monk,

Telemachus, leaped into the arena and separated the combatants, and was stoned to death by the angry Christian spectators. Only a few rarer spirits among the Christian clergy, such as St. Francis, John

Wesley and Bishop Butler have thought of pleading the cause of animals."

"Is it not a subject for home teaching, rather than for the pulpit?" asked John.

"If so, then parents are shamefully negligent in this matter. They suffer their children to glut their cruelty on cats, frogs, or any other helpless creature that cannot protect itself. Teachers have not yet accepted it as a duty, though they might do a great deal to make the future man and woman merciful."

"We have done a great deal within the last fifty years, Steve. At the beginning of this century Sir Walter Scott did not hesitate to make James Fitz-James in the Lady of the Lake, ride a noble horse to death. Any magistrate now would convict and punish a man for such cruelty, and no respectable writer would dare to make his hero guilty of such a brutal crime."

"I am grateful for what has been done, and I look forward to a day when cruelty to animals will rouse the same pity and indignation in the hearts of all, that cruelty to children, or to slaves, or to prisoners, or to any helpless portion of humanity rouses.

The great trouble is —"

"What is the great trouble, Steve?"

"That we live in the world of the Levite.

Non-interference is our rule. We hate a scene and therefore we suffer the wrong

we see, and know to be a wrong to go unpunished. Our non-interference makes us selfish, and selfishness makes us indifferferocity must be stopped! You must do your best to stop it!"

"It is a new subject of thought to me,

Steve. But I can see and feel its importance."

"Then speak for it, John. Put your heart into it. I will put my gold into it.

What a joy! what a blessing to be able to do it! Whatever else we do, we will at least try to clear The King's Highway of some of those brutes that fill it with the groans of creatures innocently bruised and beaten and done to death with unmerited tortures!"

"There are many other grand objects that this one will fit well into, Steve; but they must be well considered. Charity cannot be casual. It must be, as I said at first, an habitual well-doing, working along its own well-defined channels."

"That is right. We will have even charity done wisely and in order. I want every dollar to do its full measure of good;

and though charity, shooting at random, can hardly miss a mark, yet I am well aware that some marks are better than others; and that picked shots are best of all."

"One million dollars! Steve, we will start 'The King's Highway Fund' with it!

We will not stop at a million! How many millions of money must be spent, how many noble lives given up, ere the Way of the Lord is made straight, and all its rough places smooth, and all that defiles

it removed, and the width and the length of it regained from Apollyon, who walks

there seeking souls that may be snared or slain?"

"It is a great work John, but we will not be discouraged. Remember what you said 'it is not incumbent on us to finish the work, but not therefore must we cease from it."

And the young men impulsively stood up clasping hands as they did so, and the vow in their hearts was none the less binding, because it found no speech worthy of it. And for one moment in this exaltation of full surrender, they touched the highest peaks of spiritual joy.

Then all too soon came the reaction that ever follows such rare moments. Both felt suddenly weary, and Steve said "How thoughtless I have been! You must be worn out John. Come and I will show you a room where you can sleep and rest."

The glory of the spiritual had passed but it had left behind that enlargement of soul

SHIPWRECKS.

NE of the most pathetic sights in the world is that of a wrecked vessel. You remember how bravely it started out with its freight of merchandise or its goodly number of passengers. Happy people stood on the shore and waved their hands to those on its decks; they watched the ship out of sight and turned and went their ways. The brave, beautiful thing, moving in its stately fashion over the waves, seemed to be endowed with life, and impressed itself upon the eyes and minds of all beholders as if it had real vitality and a soul of its own to direct its movements. Not for nothing do we speak of a ship as "she," thus endowing it with a personality and fastening upon it something of the affection which we bestow upon our friends. The ship appeals to us as if it were human.

I walked up and down the shore long ago and watched the long rollers as they came in, breaking into foam and dying away at last far up on the sandy floor of the beach. I thought how just across from where I stood in a straight line were the cliffs of Spain, and how the merchantmen and passenger ships were making of the ocean a highway. What wonderful courage must Columbus have had to dare with his three little ships that untried ocean path! And yet every one of us going forth on the perilous sea is in a sense a Columbus starting out to discover unknown worlds, setting our faces toward unknown experiences. Thousands of us will do this in the coming summer, and there are always those who go and those who stay at home. I am not sure that the part of those who go forth is ever as trying as that of those who remain by the stuff. To the voyager day by day there will come new possibilities; the traveler is constantly taking in a fund of novel and interesting fancies and ideas; while to the one who remains in the home, life moves on in the old monotonous round—the same faces, the same chairs and tables, the same breakfasts and dinners and suppers; the same butcher and baker and grocer calling for orders; the routine of petty affairs wearing life into a rut so deep, that the occasional hardships which the traveler meets really take less out of him than the commonplace ease of home does from the one who never goes forth.

But this is not what I wanted to say when I began to speak of shipwrecks. The sorrow and the pathos of the wreck is that it tells of abortive efforts, of plans defeated, of purposes which have come to nothing. One day a storm caught a vessel in its toils, or something gave way in the machinery, or somebody made a mistake in the management of the ship, and a succession of calamities and disasters finally left it at the sport of the billows till at last the battered hulk was driven on the shore or the bits of drift-wood came tossing up the beach. Nothing in life presents a sadder spectacle than this, the derelict still keeping its shape and place and drifting about uselessly on the ocean, or the ship gone to pieces and at the mercy of the seas until plank by plank it breaks up and is resolved into its original parts, no longer a whole but a thing of bits and fragments.

Let us carry the comparison a little farther. The tangible material shipwrecks of this world are not the only ones which we see, nor are they confined to the ships themselves. Each human life is something like a ship sent forth to the sea, and when a fellow being makes shipwreck of his talents and opportunities, and instead of fulfilling the ends for which his Creator designed him becomes a useless encumbrance upon society, the very angels in heaven veil their faces and weep at the pity of it.

One sometimes has an experience like this, which my friend told me of the other day. He was walking down our thronged Broadway when he passed a poor, forlorn-looking tramp, with broken shoes and slouching air and a general look of shabbiness and disorder. He had gone but a few steps when the tramp came up to him and said familiarly: "Hello, John, its years and years since I saw you last," and looking in the man's face he recognized a brilliant former classmate, who had been valedictorian on Commencement Day and had started out in life with the fairest prospects. Dissipation and inebriety had done their work on this man, whose fair promise had all long ago been blighted. There must have been some point in his career when his progress toward ruin might have been arrested had the right influence been brought to bear or a friendly hand been extended. But "too late" was written in every lineament, in every rag and tag of the thread-bare clothing, in the dull eyes and the bloated face. It was the case of a man of fine powers gone to wreck through temptation and bad company.

Sometimes one sees a home wrecked through the lack of tenderness or confidence on the part of husband or wife; the one is impatient, the other extravagant; neither has sufficient self-poise or amiability to bear with the other; both insist on having the last word; children grow up in an atmosphere of constant fretfulness, and quarrels are as frequent as the coming of the family to the table. After a while the weakest place in the family chain gives way and the public is shown that there has been unsuspected trouble—a family is broken and its reputation scattered to the winds. No wreck is sadder than this, because common sense and Christian conscience might have averted the whole disaster, had they been consulted at the outset.

One sees many wrecks on the shores of our commercial life. People indulge in small infractions and evasions of responsibility. By and by there comes a disclosure and we find that one who has stood high in the confidence of his comrades has been all the while unworthy. Such a wreck is as sad as that of the brave ship which lies exposed to all the winds that blow on the naked shore.

Of course there are many instances in which ships put into drydock for repairs and come out again almost as good as new, ready for renewed encounters with the tempest, and able to go successfully on many voyages. So none of us need despair if life has been unpromising or disappointing, because the blessed thing about life is that our Father in Heaven is ready to give us another chance. If we were as gracious and kind with the erring as the Lord is with us, there would be many an instance in which those who have gone wrong would be started in the other direction and set right. Sometimes it needs only the loving look of a woman's eyes, sometimes only the cordial clasp of a good man's hand. Let us never give the push down, but always the cheery word and the helping hand up, because we are imperfect ourselves, and we need consideration and mercy at the hands of Him who looks upon us in love from the heaven over our heads. To be compassionate as God is, is the highest attainment which any man or woman can hope to reach in this world.

Margaret E. Sangster.

A Catholic Rumor.

A French ecclesiastic is quoted by the Independent as saying that the next great change in the Roman Catholic Church will be the repeal of the law of clerical celibacy. The movement, he thinks, might well start in America, under the lead of Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland, but will take time. The present Pope will hardly endorse it, nor can the French ecclesiastic take it up just now. When it does come, however, he prophesies a large exodus of Anglican clergymen to join the Church of Rome. He believes that many are deterred from joining now, only by this barrier, which excludes married men from the priesthood.

Mont-Lawn's Little Guests.

They will Soon begin to Arrive at Our Children's Home Again.

THE last two weeks have been exceedingly busy ones at our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. As in previous seasons, the Home buildings have been thoroughly aired and ventilated and every room is now as spick-and-span and shining as it is possible to make it, in anticipation of the early arrival of the little guests. It is expected that the first contingent of poor children from the crowded tenements of New York will reach the Home about the 23d day of June. They will leave the hot city by the steamer Chrystenah, which has carried thousands of the tenement waifs to the Home pier at Nyack-on-the-Hudson during the last four years. At Nyack they will be transferred to the Home wagonette and other carriages, and soon they will be whirling gleefully through the shady avenues and along the flowery roadways that lead to Mont-Lawn. There House-mother Collins and her staff of care-takers—all bright young Christian women, and nearly all with previous experience at the Home—will be ready to give them a pleasant welcome. Other large parties of poor children will follow in succession, each group stopping ten days at the Children's Home and then returning to the city, browned and strengthened by an outing that crowds months of real juvenile pleasure and physical benefit into less than two weeks.

Already the number of applications foreshadows a large increase in the number of little guests who will sojourn with us this summer. There is probably nowhere a home for the children of the slums where the little men and women take such a keen delight in their holiday as at Mont-Lawn. On its long grassy slopes, its flowery banks and lovely wooded heights, the children seem to forget all their aches and ills, and the ruddy hue of health comes back to pale cheeks and strength to weak limbs. An outing there is a tonic, which has already saved many little lives.

Visitors are welcome at Mont-Lawn, and we expect to see many there this year, especially those of our friends who have taken an active interest in this beneficent work among the little children of the tenements. Any contributions of shoes or clothing for the little folks should be addressed "The Children's Home, Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y." As the children taken are of the following ages; girls, six to twelve, boys, six to ten; nothing should be sent that is not in good condition and serviceable for children between those ages. All money contributions for the furtherance of the work should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York. Acknowledgments of all gifts in aid of the Home will be duly published in these columns.

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

By REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, D.D.

The Heroine of a Leper Colony.

MARY REED was an Ohio school teacher, and a good one, too. She taught ten years and enjoyed her work. God's call came to her to carry the good news of Christ and his salvation to the unfortunate sisters in India. The call was so clear that she could not resist

MISS MARY REED.

Thirteen years ago, she found herself in charge of zenana work in Cawnpore. She had but fairly become accustomed to her daily service, when she was stricken with a fever, and was sent to Pithora, a spot in the Himalayas for recovery. Three miles from where she was, there was an asylum for lepers, and her heart yearned in sympathy for them. She learned of their pitiful lot. She went back to Cawnpore when she was well, and there and in Gonda she put in years of hard work, coming home to her mother's home in 1890, to get her strength again. At home she began to suffer from a very severe pain in her finger. A spot also appeared on her cheek, and near the ear, and one day it was as if a flash of the dread disease of leprosy had fastened its pitiless tentacles on her body. She did not tell her mother, but confided her secret to two or three friends who could assist her in making arrangements to go to that mountain mission at Pithora as a missionary to the lepers. She bade her mother farewell, and it must be farewell forever in this world, and bravely set her face to the East. Out of tenderness for her, her father did not permit the leper colony at home to know of her disease. She had reached India. Her mother thought that she might be sure of her recovery, and she counseled with eminent specialists in London, and Bombay, who confirmed her fears. She was indeed a leper, and her sublime Christian heroism, she went to her destiny with a sad face, but with strong confidence, and earnest determination to make the very most out of the time that yet remained. A friend who traveled with her on her journey described these beautiful passages: "He and there we held sweet hours of communion, and I, who had been accustomed to see missionaries seeking America in feeble condition, could not refrain from asking if it was right for her to return to India at an unfavorable season, before her health was established. Her lips quivered, but her gentle, pleading voice grew steady as she replied, 'My Father knows the way I go, and I am sure it is the right way.' and at another time she said: 'I am returning to India under conditions which no other missionary ever returned.'

"It was in Paris that she said one evening, 'If I thought it was right, and you would promise never to speak of it, until you heard it in some other way, I should tell you my story.' I told her if aught in me inspired her confidence, that was the surest safeguard of her secret.

"On memory's walls there will hang while time lasts for me the picture of that scene. A wax taper burned dimly on the table beside her open Bible, that Book of all books from whose pages she received daily consolation; and while, without, Paris was turning night to day, with light, and music, and wine, within, Mary Reed's gentle voice, faltering only at her mother's name and coming sorrow, told the secret of her affliction.

"As my throbbing heart caught its first glimpse of her meaning, I covered my face to shut out the swiftly rising vision of her future, even to the bitter end, and almost in agony, I cried out, 'Oh, not that! Do not tell me that has come to you!'

"I come with sorrow to my last evening with Miss Reed. I sat in the shadow, and she where the full moon rising over the snowy mountains just touched her pale, sweet face, with a glory that loved to linger. Again I hear her voice in song:

Straight to my home above,
I travel calmly on,
And sing in life or death,
My Lord, thy will be done.

"On the shores of lovely Lake Lucerne, hand clasped hand for the last time on earth, and with eyes blinded by gathering tears, our farewells whispered: 'God be with you till we meet again.'

Miss Reed went directly to the leper asylum at Pithora, and although for a time the disease made rapid progress, and she suffered a great deal, she bore it all without murmuring. Her letters home were full of the sublime confidence and untiring joy of the Christ whose forlorn hope she is leading to victorious conquest among the poor lepers of the Himalayas. Think of the glory of the splendid triumphs of faith in this American girl, ten thousand miles from home, slowly dying from a terrible disease in a leper colony, in India, who could write home one August morning sentences like these: 'I could not tie myself down to my writing-desk this morning in quietness of heart till I first sat down at my dear organ, and played and sang, with all the thirteen stops out. I am dwelling on the mountain where the golden sunlight gleams.'

No one will be astonished after that, to know that God has given Mary Reed wonderful evangelistic power among the lepers under her care, and that there are constant conversions among those who behold her radiant face, and who breathe the atmosphere of her joyous self-sacrifice.

Free.—A Wonderful Shrub.—Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

New evidence shows that Alkavis, the new botanical product of the Kava-Kava Shrub, is indeed a true specific cure for diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or by disorders of the Kidneys and urinary organs. A remarkable case is that of Rev. A. C. Darling, of North Constantia, N. Y., as told in the New York World of recent date. He was cured by Alkavis, after, as he says himself, he had lost faith in man and medicine and was preparing to die. Similar testimony of extraordinary cures of Kidney and bladder diseases of long standing, comes from many other sufferers, and 1200 hospital cures have been recorded in 30 days. Up to this time the Church Kidney Cure Co., No. 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, are the only importers of Alkavis, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. To prove its wonderful curative powers, it is sent to you entirely free.

SHATTERED.

The Precarious Condition of Prof. A. H. Nye.

A Prominent Iowa Educator's Painful Experience as Related by Him to a Newspaper Man.

From the Gazette, Cedar Falls, Iowa.

The la grippe, that dread disease that had such a run throughout this country three and four years since, left many who were previously in robust health with shattered constitutions and seemingly confirmed invalids.

Prof. A. H. Nye, living at No. 2500 Olive Street, Cedar Falls, Iowa, was among the number left by the disease in a precarious condition, his nervous system shattered, and with a general debility of his entire system; no strength, feet and limbs badly swollen, in fact he was almost helpless. Prof. Nye is a native of New York State, having come west in 1886—a healthy, robust man. He is a school-teacher by profession, having served as county superintendent of schools of this (Black Hawk) county, several terms, and he has the respect of all with whom he comes in contact. His helpless condition called forth the sympathy of the entire community. He tried the best medical skill procurable, and spent most of his ready means in the vain endeavor to recover his health, and had about given up completely discouraged. He had stopped taking treatment, being fully convinced in his own mind that there was no help for him, and that he would have to spend the balance of his days as an invalid, a burden to family and friends. Some one who had heard of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, spoke to him about them and urged his giving them a trial. His poor success with eminent physicians made him skeptical and he had no faith in what was called proprietary medicine, and would not listen to this advice for some days. The friend being persistent, however, and having faith in the Pink Pills, would not let up, until he had finally prevailed upon the sufferer to send for a box, which he reluctantly did, and after receiving them decided to give them a fair trial. The first box relieved him in a surprising manner; yet he was not convinced that it was the medicine that helped him, but the weather which had turned pleasant, and did not send for a further supply until he was again about as bad as before taking the pills. Then he concluded he would make another trial, and took three boxes, and today is nearly if not quite as well as before the attack of la grippe. It is needless to state he cannot say too much for Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, for people who have been left in poor health from la grippe or any other cause. Any one wishing to test the validity of this letter can write Mr. Nye, No. 2500 Olive Street, Cedar Falls, Iowa, and he will cheerfully recommend the medicine, and state his condition before and after using.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills contain, in a condensed form, all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are an unfailing specific for such diseases as locomotor ataxia, partial paralysis, St. Vitus' dance, sciatica, neuralgia, rheumatism, nervous headache, the after effect of la grippe, palpitation of the heart, pale and sallow complexion, all forms of weakness either in male or female. Pink Pills are sold by all dealers, or will be sent postpaid on receipt of price, 50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50 (they are never sold in bulk or by the 100), by addressing Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Compounding, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be thick, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on moles may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERSEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement.—Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. Correspondence sacredly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) Cut this advertisement out.

BLESSING THE FAMINE CARGO!

"City of Everett's" Mission of Mercy—Every Corn Contributor Fully Represented—$40,000 More Cabled to American Missionaries in India.

WHEN this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reaches the hands of its readers, the Famine Relief ship, City of Everett will, in all probability, be in mid-Pacific, steaming swiftly on its way to India. On the day fixed for her sailing, and at the same hour, the Atlantic cables flash the glad news to the missionaries in Calcutta that a further remittance of forty thousand dollars has been forwarded from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund, making the fourth remittance thus far and a total of hundred thousand dollars cabled for the relief of India to date.

At the last moment, and when preparations for sending off a corn-laden steamer from New York were progressing, it was thought wise to communicate once more with India by cable before taking the final step. Unavoidable official delays in getting a steamer had retarded the work until the hot weather and it became

At this time, the City of Everett was still loading at her dock in San Francisco, and as she had a capacity considerably in excess of the cargo actually forwarded from the Western and Southwestern States, it was decided to replace by purchase in California every bushel and carload of contributed corn sold in the East on account of the change of programme. This was done accordingly, and at the present moment every contributor to the corn movement is represented in the Everett's cargo.

The day fixed for the sailing of the City of Everett was June 12, and the following programme of services was arranged, to take place on board on the day of departure. The services were to be held on dock and shipboard. Mayor J. D. Phelan, of San Francisco, was to preside and the addresses were to be limited to a ten-minute average:

1. Hymn, "Coronation," announced by Rev. M. P. Boynton, D. D. (First Baptist).
2. Scripture Reading (James 1: 22-27; and 2: 14-18), Rev. R. P. Wilson, D.D. (M. E. South), editor Pacific Christian Advocate.
3. Invocation.
4. Address, Rev. R. G. Hobbs, Ph. D., THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Commissioner.

THE FAMINE FUND RELIEF STEAMER, "CITY OF EVERETT," LOADED WITH CORN FOR INDIA—REV. R. G. HOBBS, "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD" COMMISSIONER.

It is doubtful whether corn would not spoil en route, owing to the high temperature and excessive humidity sure to be experienced after leaving the Mediterranean. Accordingly, we cabled to Sir Francis MacLean, the Chairman of the Vice-regal Committee in Calcutta, to Rev. E. W. Parker of Shahjahanpore, Secretary of the Famine Fund of the M. E. Church in India, a missionary of long experience, and to Rev. R. A. Hume, of Ahmednagar, who also has spent nearly a lifetime in the Indian field, inquiring of each as to the advisability of sending the grain to New York at this late season. Promptly from all three came the unequivocal and unanimous advice by cable, to "Sell the corn and send the money." This was accepted as conclusive, and it was strongly supported by numerous letters we had already received from missionaries who had seen service in India, but were now at home in the United States.

In the face of such counsel, it was impossible to persist in the shipment of corn to India without incurring the risk of a loss to the Relief Fund, and a waste of money appropriated by our Government for transportation. The Navy Department was apprised of the change of programme and the cause, and their negotiations for chartering the second vessel, which were still incomplete, at once terminated.

5. Address, Rev. W. S. Mathew, D.D. (Methodist), editor California Christian Advocate.
6. Address, James L. Barker, Esq., (Congregationalist).
7. Prayer, Rev. F. J. Masters, D. D., Superintendent Chinese Missions.
8. Doxology.
9. Benediction, by Rev. W. B. Berry, D.D. (Christian), editor Pacific Christian.
10. Raising of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Flag and sailing of the ship.

The Everett is what is known as a whaleback steamer. In addition to her regular flags, she flew at the maintop THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund flag, six by nine feet, with a blue cross on a red ground, the upright of the cross being five feet high and one and a-half feet wide, and the arms the same width. She is a stanch ship, with large cargo capacity and with quarters which are fairly comfortable, although lacking the elegance of the ordinary passenger steamship. Mr. Hobbs writes of her:

She is nearly all under water when loaded. In fair weather she will be a comfortable boat but in bad weather I fancy a very uncomfortable one. I think she will touch at only one port—Singapore—before reaching Calcutta. She will carry a large amount of coal—as to steam right through to Singapore, if possible. We will find it warm enough by such an

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Marguerite, New Orleans, La. Where did the inhabitants of Nod come from—where Cain found his wife? I didn't think there were any other inhabitants on the earth.

According to the legends (not history) he married his sister, and with his family founded a city which he named Nod. Josephus in his Antiquities, Chap. 3, Sec. 2, adopts this version. The word, Nod, means "exile or flight."

J. H. P., Conno, Mass. Is it not just as much our duty to tithe our ways and incomes as to keep Sabbath or any other of the Bible commands?

The Christian is not under law, but under grace. We cannot see that he is subject to the law of tithe, and he is certainly not under the Jewish law of the Sabbath. He is put on his honor as to tithe. If he has the Spirit of Christ in him he would surely do more rather than less in the way of giving than the Jew was required to do, but there is no law on the subject that he is bound to obey. It is not expected that he will do as the Pharisees did (Matt. 23: 23) or be careful to do just so much and no more than he is required to do. When he was set free from the law it was not expected that he would use his liberty to escape from duty. It is as when your child, who has been rigorously held to the rules of the household in his boyhood, grows up and is no longer under restrictions; you expect that he will voluntarily and spontaneously continue in the same course without being watched and controlled.

Constant Reader, N. Y. Will you kindly give me such information as you can about Melchizedek, or tell me where I can get it. Is anything known as to who were his father and mother? Could Shem have been Melchizedek?

He is represented in Scripture as the Priest-King of Salem (afterward Jerusalem), a dual office not infrequently combined in patriarchal times, where the King was also the spiritual head of his people. Next to Christ himself, probably no character in sacred history has attracted more attention or been the subject of more varied conjecture. Some scholars hold that he was Shem, and a survivor of the Deluge, and the paramount lord and high priest of Canaan. Others have contended that he was an angel, and some of the more ancient writers have asserted the conviction that he was the Son of God, appearing to the patriarch in human form. Josephus, the celebrated Jewish historian and others, including Carpov, seem to hold that he was a principal person among the Canaanites and the posterity of Noah, eminent for holiness and justice. The statement that he was without father and mother is also variously interpreted, one construction being that his parents were not of sufficient note to have had their names preserved in history.

Reader. When a wagon is going on the road, does that part of the wheel that is close to the ground go slower than the opposite side that is free?

The rim or tire of the wheel travels faster than the hub, having to make a much larger revolution or circuit in the same time it takes the hub to revolve, but the part of the tire that is on the ground is necessarily traveling at the same rate around its own axis, as that part which is farthest from the ground. If the centre of the earth be regarded as the axis, that part of the wheel which rests upon the ground, being nearer the central axis, would be traveling slower than the top part, which is farther from the central axis. The computation of the difference would depend upon the size of the wheel.

A. R. L., Memphis, Tenn. What were the names of those wise men of whom we have an account in Matthew, second chapter, that went to see the babe Jesus?

Their names are given by some early writers as Baltasar, Melchior, and Gaspar.

L. N. K., Denver, Colo. 1. What has become of the books to which the writer refers in 1. Chronicles 20: 24, and other places? 2. What is the meaning of the word "Cris" prefixed to dates in the margin of our reference Bible?

1. They are lost. That is to say if they are in existence anywhere, no one knows where they are. The titles of nineteen books are mentioned in the Bible which are missing, such as the Book of the Wars of the Lord mentioned Numbers 21: 14 and the Book of the Acts of Solomon mentioned 1. Kings 11: 41. There is no doubt that the historical books of the Bible as we now have them were compiled from older books or documents which were not preserved. 2. It is a contraction of the Latin word circiter, meaning about, and the date with that prefix is in some instances little more than a guess.

J. P. K., Cambridge, N. Y., writes:

I have just finished reading the sermon in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 20th, and I cannot help thinking that if every clergyman in the land had the courage to preach such words from their pulpits they would have a powerful influence against the liquor traffic. The poor, unfortunate slaves to the liquor habit would see they had earthly friends who were ready to give them words of cheer through Christ, who died for us all, and that through him they could get rid of their awful habit.

H. E. B., Whitesboro, N. Y. 1. Did Job sin when he cursed the day of his birth? 2. Is it right for a person who has been prominent in Sunday School work to absent himself or herself from Sunday School because of a dislike to the superintendent? 3. How long will it take the corn-ship to reach India after starting?

1. He did, but his offence is not to be judged by ordinary standards. He was driven to the utmost point of human forbearance, a condition in which most men would have been far more violent than he. 2. The cause seems an unreasonable one and not sufficient to justify when friends would call to see me I'd show them the box, and they most always gave something. Being mostly children, their pennies were not very plentiful, but when they understood that one penny would feed a child one day, they were very anxious to give all they had.

Subscriber, Southampton, N. Y. 1. Is it right for Christians to ride out for pleasure on Sunday? 2. Is there any alcohol whatever either in root beer or in the extract? 3. Can a Christian run a lively stable and keep it open on the Lord's day? 4. In the light of Christ's teachings, is it right for a business man to collect a bill from a creditor by suing at law? 5. If Christians everywhere followed Christ's command "To love our neighbors as ourselves," would it not do away entirely with business rivalry and the hard feelings that often follow? 6. Is it a Christian's duty to keep giving to the Lord, when he owes his fellow-men as much as he can possibly pay?

1. No; it is a desecration of the day and a violation of the commandment. Only works of necessity or of mercy are to be engaged in. 2. None whatever. 3. He can, but he will be committing a sin in so doing. 4. Law is for the enforcement of right and justice. Its abuse and not its use, is against Christian teaching. Litigation should be avoided except as a last resort. 5. To a large extent it would, but such a condition cannot be realized until the millennium comes. 6. He should pay his debts. See Romans 13: 8. God does not want a man to defraud his creditors that he may make a gift to the church.

J. E. M., Center Stafford, N. H. 1. If a minister, whose time is fully occupied, reads everything in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will he have a sufficient knowledge of the secular things of the world without reading any other paper? If not, what other paper would you advise him to read? 2. Who was the author of "Blessed be nothing?"

1. No, he will not. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does not claim to cover the entire field of secular events, although it refers to many that have a bearing on the religious and material progress of the race. A pastor should be well pray for death; but when it is past become calm the true Christians are to wait the Lord's time. They know patient submission to his will, they witnesses to the world of the power of grace.

H. G. M., Lafayette, Ind. Is there such in the Bible as "Be temperate in all?"

Probably you refer to Paul's remark 1. Cor. 7: 35 "Every man that striveth for holiness is temperate in all things," or (1. Cor. 13: 31) "Let your moderation be known unto all."

Subscriber, Washington, D. C. How do you make of twain one new man, as Paul (Eph. 2: 15)?

The Jew and the Gentile are brought together by Christ's incarnation, death, but become actually a new man. The Christian reverences the Old Testament and sees in it, equally with the New Testament, yet he is not a Jew. He is a new man in the religious history of the world. Through Christ he was a new person in this country we have a type of it. Women of many nationalities and of many ages, and out of the many comes the new man with many of the old surviving. Some of our best statesmen have been of Scotch-Irish parentage.

J. F. P., Avalon, Ga. Who were the parents of the five foolish virgins were (Matt. 25: 9): "Go ye rather to them that sell, on what ground did they afterward admission?"

You cannot identify every accessory. The five virgins might be the case of an actual marriage, but we consider Christ as the bridegroom who conceive of his people buying anything could fit them to receive him. The put away their worldliness, separated themselves from their sinful associations, seek to fit themselves for their Lord's coming. But all this should have been foretold. Those who go in with the marriage feast are those waiting for him and are ready to come him at his coming.

L. H. C., Boston, Mass. Is it true that a missionary society in your city, that a missionary society you gave money for distribute the famine sufferers in India, do know just how to use it?

We do not know of such a case. One instance a missionary to whom I wrote stating that we had $500 through his missionary distribution, sent us a letter thanking us. He said that he had received the money, and that come he could have done a great deal of good with it. He had been disappointed by its not being sent to him, but he begged us to send him money to the sufferers around him, but preferred that it should be sent to the missionaries. He has since written us that it has sent him the money. Perhaps it is the case the journal you mention. It is the Board which that journal is most closely associated with. We could not understand the Board delayed sending the money, never supposed that it was, as the missionaries, because the Board ignorant of the needs of its missionaries.

A NATIVE HOUSE OF ECUADOR, SOUTH AMERICA.

The people of this little, independent State are still surrounded by very primitive conditions. The roads are wretched, communication is difficult, the rivers and gorges are spanned by rude rope or wooden bridges, and the dwellings, outside of the cities, are of the poorest description. Education, which has been left in the hands of the Catholic clergy, is very defective, except in the large cities. Our photograph represents a country home of the kind that is common in Ecuador.

So much good has been done in various directions through your paper in alleviating suffering humanity, can you not do something toward the relief of the dumb animals? It makes my heart ache to see and hear of the way in which so many of them are treated. I have no doubt you could do very much in that direction, if you would. There are so many different ways open.

There is already legislation on the subject, and if you will write to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, New York City, you will be fully informed of the steps already taken in that direction. We shall be pleased to do what we can to forward so good an object.

Christ was warning men not to make light of any part of God's Word. Though wrong teaching might not exclude them from heaven it might involve their having a low place there. 2. THE CHEYENNE RISING.

It was Short-lived, but Might have been Very Serious—A Warlike Tribe, Still Uncivilized.

FOR several weeks past, trouble has been brewing in the Indian country in Montana, known as the Tongue River Reservation. It sprang out of the bad feeling which has so long existed between the Cheyennes—a warlike and only half-civilized tribe—and the farmers, ranchmen and band of warriors broke away and started North. When they had been overtaken and subdued, the tribe was brought to their present reservation on the Tongue River. It is said to be a wretched selection, worthless for agricultural purposes and one on which the tribe can never become self-supporting.

Unquestionably, there are two sides to the Cheyenne outbreak. Competent observers claim that the redmen have been unfairly treated; that they are capable and willing to make the best of their position, but have been pressed to the wall, and denied the opportunity for advancement. With better treatment they would develop into citizenship, and they are represented by those who know them well, as being really anxious to improve.

AN INDIAN CAMP ON THE WESTERN PLAINS.

orders of the section. It is not satisfactorily explained which side the aggressor, but it is claimed the Indians, being detected in some stealing operations, were stirred up by the whites and determined to go to warpath. A white sheep-herder was ordered, and this was followed by a band of the Cheyennes leaving the bucks and warriors declaring their intention to exterminate the whites, and of 125 warriors deserted the Tongue River Agency on May 28 and fled to the hills near Ashland. Soon afterwards were reported from different parts in Montana. Several whites were killed, and it was only the presence in control force of United States troops in the neighborhood of the trouble that prevented a battle between the settlers and the Cheyennes.

Being seriously alarmed the settlers assembled together, whereupon troops were applied to the War Department through the Agency at Lame Deer, to be protected. This seems to be a piece of diplomacy, as at the time the request was made parties of the Cheyennes were riding around, fully armed and defiant. The more timid settlers removed their families to Miles and the other nearby towns, believing that the usual Spring outbreak might culminate in an Indian war and be disastrous to the scattered whites, before the Government could intervene.

Fortunately, the prompt action of the War Department was the means of quelling the disturbance before it attained serious proportions. Several Cheyenne warriors have been arrested, including a man named David Stanley, known to his people as "Badger." Other names in the disturbances are "White Wolf" and "Low Dog."

Since the United States sent the Sheriff and posse, reinforced with armed settlers, prepared for emergency.

During the past Winter, the Cheyennes have been holding dances in their "dance-houses," at which the old warriors have been rehearsing the story of their old-time wars against the white men, for the purpose of stirring up the young men up to the fighting point. These dances are among the oldest of the Indian tribe and in the campaign of 1863, and 1876 they were sent to the Indian Territory, where they were restless and unhappy there, a

A CHEYENNE BRAVE.

It is probable that the present trouble may result in attracting attention to their condition and that the treatment hereafter may be of a character more in harmony with the nation's avowed policy with regard to its Indian wards. Their reservation needs more of the influences of Christianity and civilization to bring out the better qualities of the tribe. Some of the Cheyennes have been educated at government schools and are capable of a better career than that of painted warriors. It is to be hoped that the case of the Cheyennes will prove to be a turning-point in the history of our treatment of one tribe at least, who have shown themselves by their forbearance and patience under injustice, to be worthy of more humane treatment than they have received. Schools, churches and industrial tools are the true and only means of civilizing our redmen and bringing them up to the standard of useful citizenship.

Gospel Progress in China.

At a recent meeting in England, connected with the London Missionary Society, the Rev. John Macgowan, Amoy, China, related this incident: "A man started off one morning with a load of wood to a town ten miles distant. He sold his burden, and was attracted by a crowd near the market-place. He pushed his way into the crowd and saw that it was a missionary who was speaking. The first thing he heard him say was, 'All the idols of China are false.'"

This sentence was quite a revelation to the man, and he could not believe it, and after listening for some time he proceeded home, pondering over the words all the way. He told his mother what he had heard, and she said, 'My son, don't say that; your father worshiped the idols and so did my father.' The young man added that he had come to the conclusion that what he had heard was true. His mother was much distressed, but he gave up his idol-worship. After conversion he became a preacher of the Gospel in the mountain district of China, and had the joy of leading his mother to Christ."

In one village called San Yuam, which is known as the 'Gospel Village,' the native converts were anxious to secure a room to hold services in, and so they undertook to build a place themselves, and also find the material. A chapel was in this way erected to accommodate 300 or 400 persons, and the cost to the Baptist Society was only £15. When one missionary was returning to England the people presented him with a silk banner, bearing the inscription in Chinese letters, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord."

Training Young Heathen.

Missionary Mary Sharp Writes of Her Experiences Teaching African Children—A Greatly Blessed Work.

ONE of our devoted American missionaries in the African field is Mary Sharp, whose station is Monrovia, Liberia. She writes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as follows:

Your letter reached me in twenty-eight days after it was written, and at a peculiar time. I had planned to enlarge my church so as to have seating capacity for about 800, and had commenced gathering material, but the lack of sufficient money and other untoward circumstances made me feel rather discouraged, when your letter came with a check for $15. The rapidity with which it came, also the route—a German steamer, I had never before received a letter via Germany—made it seem to me that "The King" gave orders to dispatch it quickly. Its coming and the circumstances surrounding it gave a wonderful uplift to my faith. Stone for foundation can be easily obtained, but the lumber! The natives saw it, by cross-cut saws, elevate the log upon something like "saw-horses," one stands on the log, the other below, the one above pulls the saw up, and the one below pulls it down—rather slow work—then it is carried to the river, put in canoes, brought to Monrovia just a little at a time, as the canoes are dug-outs. The native woods are very hard and durable.

Many complain of the meagre result of missions on the West Coast of Africa, that after all these years they are still an exotic, having no permanent root. Very few missions have been kept up for any number of years consecutively, owing to the deadliness of the climate. For instance, Liberia is the oldest mission field of the Methodist Episcopal Church, established in 1833. The first missionary, Melville B. Cox, lived four months. On the same marble shaft are the names of Rev. Osgood Wright and wife, a young couple from Massachusetts, landed January 4th. (Mrs. Wright lived one month, died February 4th.) He lived until the 28th of March, the same year. In a short time, from deaths, and returning home in broken health, the work would be suspended until others came, and they in turn would succumb to the climate, and longer intervals would occur. Very little work, much less a permanent foundation, could be laid in that way.

Then Africa is divided up into unnumbered tribes, each tribe with a different language, and none reduced to writing. Some missionaries have spent a great deal of time, taking down words when spoken and reducing them to a written language, but the meagreness and poverty of the language fail to express any very exalted or spiritual ideas. It is not easy to teach a class of young heathen where the pupils cannot understand a word that the teacher says, and vice versa. My first attempt was not a success; yet I meant that they should learn English. I went into the heathen town, and found one man who could interpret for me. We went to the Chief's house. He had taken an American name—"Two-Glass." After duly making known my errand to teach the Kroo people "God palaver and him pickanniny book sabee," the boys were called in and sat down on the clay floor. After telling the boys what I intended to do, one bright little fellow said, "Mammy, me sabee English proper. I tell you all dem boy name. My name be 'Jack-after-Supper,' dat be my 'Merican name. Dat boy name 'Flying-jib-and-topsail,' dat toddler boy be 'Schooner,' 'Tea-pot,' 'Two-pound-ten,' next were told off with the astounding information that "dem all have proper 'Merican names."

Next day they came to my room to school. Alas! for me, "Jack-after-Supper," was not there. They rushed in with a hurrah, all laughing and talking Kroo. I said, "keep still." They shouted "keep still," and laughed heartily over the success of their first lesson. I put my hand on my mouth to denote silence; every mouth was covered with a hand. I smiled, they laughed loudly at scoring another success. After several attempts I stamped my foot and made a gesture with my hands and said, "Do hush!" Every one stamped, threw out their hands, and exclaimed, "Do hush!" They went away, seemingly delighted with their first day at school. I had a very poor opinion of my first attempt at teaching heathen boys, but English they must have. Some of that number now talk excellent English, all speak so as to be understood.

Jack-after-Supper was afterward converted, lived a devoted Christian a few years, and died triumphantly. After conversion, he was always grave and serious, would invariably ask that "Down at the Cross where my Saviour Died," be sung at every meeting. He was not much of a singer, but would come in on the chorus, "Glory to His Name!" Flying-jib-and-topsail, was baptized with the name of Wesley Haven and is an excellent interpreter, and always enlivens a meeting with his good singing. A people that know English and can read the English Bible, may be indifferent to the Gospel, even wicked, but can never go back to heathenism. Heathen here, are heathen, not Confucianists, nor Buddhists, but simply without any knowledge of God, the Supreme One; no books, very little tradition even. No religion, not even a false religion. Each has his own fetish, sometimes a pole stuck in the ground with a streamer attached; often a goat-horn with some "medicine" inside. The "medicine" is prepared by the "devil doctor" and is "to keep witch away," "bring them luck," help them to triumph over an enemy, &c. Evil spirits surround and follow them from their birth to the grave.

I find the people ripe for the Gospel, anxious to learn books, and very desirous to know English, which is our open door.

MARY SHARP.

THE FIRST WOMAN.

A Sermon by

Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Gen. 3: 6

And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof and did eat and gave also unto her husband with her, and he did eat.

It is the first Saturday afternoon in the world's existence. Ever since sunrise Adam has been watching the brilliant pageantry of wings and scales and clouds, and in his first lessons in zoology and ornithology and ichthyology he has noticed that the robins fly the air in twos, and that the fish swim the water in twos, and that the lions walk the fields in twos, and in the warm recollection of that Saturday afternoon he falls off into slumber; and as if by allegory to teach all ages that the greatest of earthly blessings is sound sleep, this paradisaical somnolence ends with the discovery on the part of Adam of a corresponding intelligence just landed on a new planet. Of the mother of all the living I speak—Eve, the first, the fairest, and the best.

I make me a garden. I inlay the paths with mountain moss, and I border them with pearls from Ceylon and diamonds from Golconda. There are woodbine and honeysuckle climbing over the wall, and starred spaniels sprawling themselves on the grass. And yet the place is a desert filled with darkness and death as compared with the residence of the woman of the text, the subject of my story. Never since have such skies looked down through such leaves into such waters! Never has river wave had such curve and sheen and bank as adorned the Pison, the Havilah, the Gihon, and the Hiddekel, even the pebbles being bdellium and onyx stone! What fruits, with no curculio to sting the rind! What flowers, with no slug to gnaw the root! What atmosphere, with no frost to chill and with no heat to consume! Bright colors tangled in the grass. Perfume in the air. Music in the sky. Great scene of gladness and love and joy.

Right there under a bower of leaf and vine and shrub occurred the first marriage. Adam took the hand of this immaculate daughter of God and pronounced the ceremony when he said: "Bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh." A forbidden tree stood in the midst of that exquisite park. Eve sauntering out one day alone looks up at the tree and sees the beautiful fruit, and wonders if it is sweet, and wonders if it is sour, and standing there, says: "I think I will just put my hand upon the fruit; it will do no damage to the tree; I will not take the fruit to eat, but I will just take it down to examine it." She examined the fruit. She said: "I do not think there can be any harm in my just breaking the rind of it." She put the fruit to her teeth, she tasted, she allowed Adam also to taste the fruit, the door of the world opened, and the monster Sin entered. Let the heavens gather blackness, and the winds sigh on the bosom of the hills, and cavern, and desert, and earth, and sky join in one long, deep, hell-rending howl—"The world is lost!"

Beasts that before were harmless and full of play put forth claw and sting, and tooth and fang. Birds whet their beak for prey. Clouds troop in the sky. Sharp thorns shoot up through the soft grass. Blasts on the leaves. All the chords of that great harp are snapped. Upon the first day of this world ever saw our first parents turned their back and led forth on a path of sorrow the broken-hearted millions of a doomed race.

Do you not see in the first place, the danger of a poorly regulated inquisitiveness? She wanted to know how the fruit tasted. She found out, but six thousand years have deplored that unhealthy curiosity. Healthful curiosity has done a great deal for letters, for art, for science, and for religion. It has gone down into the depths of the earth with the geologist and seen the first chapter of Genesis written in the book of nature illustrated with engraving on rock, and it stood with the antiquarian while he blew the trumpet of resurrection over buried Herculaneum and Pompeii, until from their sepulchre there came up shaft and terrace and amphitheatre. Healthful curiosity has enlarged the telescopic vision of the astronomer until worlds hidden in the distant heavens have trooped forth and have joined the choir praising the Lord. Planet weighed against planet and wildest comet lassoed with resplendent law.

I say nothing against healthful curiosity. May it have other Leyden jars, and other electric batteries, and other voltaic piles, and other magnifying-glasses, with which to storm the barred castles of the natural world until it shall surrender its last secret. We thank God for the geological curiosity of Professor Hitchcock, and the mechanical curiosity of Liebig, and the zoological curiosity of Cuvier, and the inventive curiosity of Edison; but we must admit that unhealthy and irregular inquisitiveness has rushed thousands and tens of thousands into ruin.

Eve just tasted the fruit. She was curious to find out how it tasted, and that curiosity blasted her and blasted all nations. So there are clergymen in this day inspired by unhealthy inquisitiveness who have tried to look through the key-hole of God's mysteries—mysteries that were barred and bolted from all human inspection, and they have wrenched their whole moral nature out of joint by trying to pluck fruit from branches beyond their reach, or have come out on limbs of the tree from which they have tumbled into ruin without remedy. A thousand trees of religious knowledge from which we may eat and get advantage; but from certain trees of mystery how many have plucked their ruin! Election, free agency, trinity, resurrection—in the discussion of these subjects hundreds and thousands of people ruin the soul. There are men who actually have been kept out of the kingdom of heaven because they could not understand who Melchisedec was not!

Oh, how many have been destroyed by an unhealthy inquisitiveness! It is seen in all directions. There are those who stand with the eye-stare and mouth-gape of curiosity. They are the first to hear a falsehood, build it another story high and two wings to it. About other people's apparel, about other people's business, about other people's financial condition, about other people's affairs, they are over-anxious. Every nice piece of gossip stops at their door, and they fatten and luxuriate in the endless round of the great world of tittle-tattle. Whoever hath an innuendo, whoever hath a scandal, whoever hath a valuable secret, let him come and sacrifice it to this Goddess of Splutter. Thousands of Adams and Eves do nothing but eat fruit that does not belong to them. Men quite well known as mathematicians failing in this computation of moral algebra: good sense plus good breeding, minus curiosity, equals minding your own affairs!

Then, how many young men through curiosity go through the whole realm of French novels, to see whether they are really as bad as moralists have pronounced them! They come near the verge of the precipice just to look off. They want to see how far it really is down, but they lose their balance while they look, and fall into remediless ruin; or, catching themselves, clamber up, bleeding and ghastly, on the rock, gibbering with curses and groaning ineffectual prayer. By all means encourage healthful inquisitiveness, by all means discourage illy-regulated curiosity.

This subject also impresses me with the fact that fruits that are sweet to the taste may afterward produce great agony. Forbidden fruit for Eve was so pleasant she invited her husband also to take of it; but her banishment from Paradise and six thousand years of sorrow, and wretchedness, and war, and woe paid for that luxury. Sin may be very sweet at the start, and it may induce great wretchedness, afterward. The cup of sin is sparkling at the top, but there is death at the bottom. Intoxication has great exhilaration for awhile, and it fills the blood, and it makes a man see five stars where others can see only one star, and it makes the poor man rich, and turns cheeks which are white red as roses; but what about the dreams that come after, when he seems falling from great heights, or is prostrated by other fancied disasters, and the perspiration stands on the forehead—the night dew of everlasting darkness—and he is ground under the horrible hoof of nightmares shrieking with lips that crackle with all-consuming torture? "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment!" Sweet at the start, horrible at the last. Go into that hall of revelry, where ungodly mirth staggers and blasphemes. Listen to the senseless gabble, see the last trace of intelligence dashed out from faces made in God's own image. "Aha! aha!" says the roystering inebriate; "this is joy for you; fill high your cups, my boys. I drink to my wife's misery and my children's rags and my God's defiance." And he knows not that a fiend stirs the goblet in his hand and thatadders uncoil from the dregs and thrust their forked tongues hissing through the froth on the rim. Sin rapturous at the start, awful at the last.

That one Edenic transgression did not seem to be much, but it struck a blow which to this day makes the earth stagger. To find out the consequences of that one sin, you would have to compel the world to throw open all its prison doors and display the crime, and throw open all its hospitals and display the disease, and throw open all the insane asylums and show the wretchedness, and open all the sepulchres and show the dead, and open all the doors of the lost world and show the damned. That one Edenic transgression stretched chords of misery across the heart of the world and struck them with dolorous wailing, and it has seated the plagues upon the air and the shipwrecks upon the tempest, and fastened, like a leech, famine to the heart of the sick and dying nations. Beautiful at the start, horrible at the last. Oh, how many have experienced it!

Are there here those who are votaries of pleasure? Let me warn you, my brother. Your pleasure boat is far from shore, and your summer day is ending roughly, for the winds and the waves are loud-voiced, and the overcoming clouds are all awrithe and agleam with terror. You are past the "Narrows," and almost outside the "Hook," and if the Atlantic take thee, frail mortal, thou shalt never get to shore again. Put back, row swiftly, swifter, swifter! Jesus from the shore casteth a rope. Clasp it quickly, now or never. Oh, are there not some of you who are freighting all your loves and joys and hopes upon a vessel which shall never reach the port of heaven? Thou nearest the breakers. One heave upon the rocks. Oh, what an awful crash was that! Another lunge may crush thee beneath the spars or grind thy bones to powder amid the torn timbers. Overboard for your life, overboard! Trust not that loose plank nor attempt the wave, but quickly clasp the feet of Jesus walking on the watery pavement, shouting until he hear thee: "Lord, save me, or I perish." Sin beautiful at the start—oh, how sad, how distressful at the last! The ground over which it leads you is hollow. The fruit it offers to your taste is poison. The promise it makes to you is a lie. Over that ungodly banquet the keen sword of God's judgment hangs, and there are ominous hand-writings on the walls.

Observe also in this subject how repelling sin is when appended to great attractiveness. Since Eve's death there has been no such perfection of womanhood. You could not suggest an attractiveness to the body or suggest any refinement to the manner. You could add no gloss to the gait, no lustre to the sweetness to the voice. A perfect woman, to be the companion of a perfect man in a home, and her entire nature vibrates accord with the beauty and song of paradise. But she rebelled against God's command, and with the same hand which she plucked the fruit she laid upon the world the crimes, the wretchedness, that have set the universe aflame.

A terrible offset to all her attractiveness. We are not surprised when men and women naturally vulgar sink into transgression. We expect that people who live in the ditch shall have manners of the ditch; but how shocked when we find sin appended to such education and to the refinements of life! The accomplishments of the Queen of Scots make her patroness Darnley, the profligate, the more appealing. The genius of Catharine II. of Russia only sets forth in more powerful contrast her unappeasable ambition. The lations from the Greek and the Latin, Elizabeth, and her wonderful qualifications for a queen, make the more glaring her capriciousness of affection, her hotness of temper. The great Byron's mind makes the more all the more his sensuality.

Let no one think that refinement, manner or exquisiteness of taste or ority of education can in any wise gize for ill-temper, for an oppressive for unkindness, for any kind of sin. obedience Godward and transgression manward can give no excuse. A plishment heaven-high is no apology vice hell-deep.

My subject also impresses me with the regal influence of woman. When Eve with this powerful influence Adam and over the generations that followed, it suggests to me the power all women have for good or evil. I have no sympathy, nor have I with the hollow flatteries showered upon woman from the platform and the press. They mean nothing; they are accepted nothing. Woman's nobility consists in the exercise of a Christian influence when I see this powerful influence upon her husband and upon the human race, I make up my mind to frail arm of woman can strike a blow which will resound through all the ages down among the dungeons or up to the thrones.

Of course, I am not speaking of representative women—of Eve, who ruined race by one fruit-picking; of Jacob who drove a spike through the head of the warrior; of Esther, who overcame the power of the king; of Abigail, who stopped a quarrel by her own beautiful prowess; of the mother of the world's Saviour; of the mother Lois, immortalized in her son Timothy; of Charlotte Corday who drove the dagger through the heart of an assassin of her lover; or of Marie Antoinette, who by one look from the balcony her castle quieted a mob, her own the throne of forgiveness and of courage. I speak not of these extraordinary persons, but of those who, untiring for political power, as wives and mothers and sisters and daughters, to the thousand sweet offices of home.

When at last we come to calculate the forces that decided the destiny of nations it will be found that the mightiest grandest influence came from home. The wife cheered up despondency, the figure and sorrow by her own sympathy and the mother trained her child heaven, starting the little feet on the way to the Celestial City; and the sister's gentleness refined the manner of the brother; and the daughters were gentle in their kindness to the aged, the wreaths of blessing on the road that father and mother down the street years. God bless our homes! And the home on earth be the vestibule of home in heaven, in which place we all meet—father, mother, son, daughter, brother, sister, grandfather and mother and grandchild, and the group of precious ones, of whom we say in the words of Charles Wesley

One family we dwell in him.

One Church above, beneath;

Though now divided by the stream

The narrow stream of death;

One army of the living God,

Part of the host have crossed the flood

With any limitations I can think of, I cannot help regarding the statement as conveying a most erroneous impression to the American reader. It has been my

FAMINE INQUIRIES ANSWERED.

DURING the progress of the India Famine Fund, we have received a large number of letters from our readers, inquiring as to many matters of interest in connection with the Fund. As these are of general interest to all who have been associated in the movement, we give space below to a number of the more urgent and important:

Q. Is the statement of Mr. George A. Kittredge, to the effect that no one has died of starvation in India during the present famine, true?

A. It is not. See letter of Dr. Washburn in this issue.

Q. How many deaths from starvation will the present famine result in?

A. It is difficult to give accurate figures, though it will unquestionably be several millions. Julian Hawthorne, who has just returned from the famine districts of India, announces that it is officially admitted that thus far there have been three million deaths from starvation.

Q. Are the pictures of emaciated men and children, which from time to time have appeared on the Famine Fund pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, overdrawn?

A. They are not. Most of the pictures which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were made from photographs taken by Mr. Benjamin Aitken, our representative in India, or by resident missionaries, for the purpose of illustrating the terrible character of the suffering. The camera cannot lie. It will not reduce a well-fed man to a skeleton, any more than it will clothe a skeleton with flesh. Many of the original photographs can be seen in the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The picture representing a dying man surrounded by vultures and jackals, is taken from the Illustrated London Graphic. As we stated when we published it, the artist who drew the picture wrote that he was an eyewitness of the scene he depicted.

Q. Is the famine nearly over, or does it show signs of abatement?

A. If the reports of the government relief works, as published in the London Times, and other official reports in the public prints of England and India, are any indication of the famine condition in India, we should say, in view of the fact that the number of dependants is gradually increasing, that the famine is worse than it was three months ago. Many of the missionaries right in the famine field agree that the famine has not yet reached its climax, and that no abatement must be looked for before December next.

Q. Did a Foreign Missionary Board return to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a large remittance intended for the relief of the famine sufferers?

A. No. One of the Boards, not having any available funds to pay cable charges, wanted to mail its apportionment from the Famine Fund, but owing to the urgent need of immediate help, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD did not consent to such an arrangement, and cabled the money at its own expense. Since then, the same Missionary Board has intimated its perfect willingness hereafter to cable at its own expense any further appropriation it may receive.

Q. I have a dear relative acting as missionary in the Bilaspur district. Can you tell me whether there is any suffering from famine there, as I would like to send some money for relief of temporal necessities?

A. Miss Mary D. Adams, Missionary in charge of the station of the Church of the Disciples at Bilaspur, writes us under date of May 11th:

I send you to-day several pictures of famine sufferers. They tell their own sad story of hunger, some of them being literally living skeletons only. They are typical of many others to be seen all over the Central Provinces and in many parts of India. I should like to show a lot of these poor sufferers sitting at a dinner supplied by Christian America, but for the present I cannot do so. I shall be glad to receive any help you can send to the people and shall regard the work as a sacred one put into my hands by the Father on high, working through his people.

Q. What is the basis of apportionment by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the Famine Fund among the Missionaries in India?

A. We invariably first consult the secretaries of the Foreign Missionary Societies which are represented in the famine districts, and obtain from them the names of the missionaries who are particularly active in relief work. The missionary boards thus far consulted have been the following: Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist, Methodist, Christian (Disciples), Reformed Presbyterian, Woman's Union Missionary Society, Missionary Alliance, and the Salvation Army. In addition to the information obtained from these sources, we are largely guided by reports from the famine field, obtained by our correspondents, and from our representative residing in Calcutta, and by the advice of missionaries now on furlough in this country, who labor in India. We are also aided by the prayerful consideration of letters received from missionaries who have already been helped by the Fund and by direct appeals for help.

Q. Are not the British authorities abundantly competent to meet the situation?

A. All the reports received from India agree that the Indian government is doing everything in its power, and that, but for the very efficient help it renders, the death-rate must have been inevitably higher; yet the mere fact that 3,000,000 people have already died, is the best proof that they are by no means masters of the situation. Lord Dufferin, formerly Viceroy of India, recently wrote:

I cannot conclude without appealing to those who may read these lines, on behalf of the suffering multitudes who, at this very moment are in the throes of as dire a calamity as ever visited the human race. . . . The share still left to be performed by public charity is almost illimitable.

Mrs. Mary S. Winsor, wife of the Rev. Richard Winsor, American Board Missionary, at Sirur, Poona District, writes us under date of May 7th:

Our heartfelt thanks are sent for what you have done; again we pray that you will give us this great blessing—the opportunity to save the children. I write in haste to get this letter off by this mail for parents are dying and children are suffering, and will perish by the hundreds and thousands for the Relief Camps do not save them. Many die in connection with those very Relief Works. . . . Do not let the children die as they are dying all over India all around us. Come to their rescue.

Q. Is there any other agency for the collection and transmission of moneys intended for the relief of the famine sufferers of India?

A. The entire India Relief work of this country is conducted under the auspices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. A great many agencies have contributed to the magnificent results attained. Readers of the Sunday School Times, Golden Rule, Epworth Herald, and Chicago Advance, and active relief committees in various centres, operating under instructions or in response to appeals received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, have largely swelled the Fund sent in by individual contributors. We know of no other paper, or society, or organization operating independently of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In Canada, a fund aggregating $50,000 has been raised by the Montreal Star, which was the first in the field on this side of the ocean.

Q. What caused the delay in shipping the grain to India, and in the departure of the City of Everett?

A. FIRST: Bad roads, which made it impossible for the farmers to get the corn which they had pledged to the railroad station. SECOND: The difficulty experienced by the Honorable Secretary of the Navy in securing an "AMERICAN" vessel, as required by the provision of the original Bill, granting free transportation.

Q. How much money has THE CHRISTIAN HERALD thus far cabled to India?

A. With the remittance mentioned in this issue of the paper, the sum of $100,000 free and clear of all deductions, has been sent and is now being distributed in about fifty missionary centres, by over seventy men and women who have consecrated their lives to the Lord's service and who labor unceasingly for the salvation of souls, far away from home and kindred, enduring all sorts of privations for Jesus' sake.

Q. How many people are supposed to be suffering from the effects of this famine in India?

A. Mr. Benjamin Aitken, our representative in India, estimates that 150,000,000 persons are seriously affected, but the Indian Government will not admit that more than 80,000,000 are suffering. But even at the lower estimate, it is safe to say that this famine is probably the worst that has ever struck the earth since the beginning of time.

Q. What is the per centage of expense in connection with the handling of money sent for the relief of India famine sufferers?

A. We cannot give accurate information at this time, but it is infinitesimal. In due time, a carefully itemized and properly audited statement of receipts and expenses will be published, at the close of the Fund, in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Q. I notice in the daily newspapers that you have relinquished the idea of sending a cargo of grain by way of the Red Sea. What have you done with the corn contributed?

The corn sent East has been or will be sold, and for every bushel sold, a corresponding quantity was purchased to complete the cargo of the Everett, which has on board 90,000 bushels. Thus, every corn contributor to the Fund is represented in corn, as originally intended, but the corn goes by way of the Pacific, instead of the Red Sea.

Q. Do the great Protestant missionary societies operating in the India field know of the sufferings on their mission fields?

A. The great Protestant Missionary Societies do know, and here and in England are doing their utmost to relieve the suffering. Dr. James L. Barton, Secretary of the American Board, writes us: "On behalf of the suffering millions of India and our missionaries who because unable to furnish relief, suffer with them, I want to thank you for the liberal contributions which you have raised, and are forwarding to the missionaries." Bishop Thoburn, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, says: "This famine differs from all others recorded in history in the fact that it affects almost the whole empire. We already have orphans enough upon our hands to use up all the funds that will have been sent in." Mr. Chas. W. Hand of the Presbyterian Board, writes us under date of May 25, 1897, thanking us for contributions, and telling us that he had received a letter from Rev. H. M. Andrews, one of their missionaries in India, earnestly pleading on behalf of himself and his fellow-missionaries for funds to feed the starving people around their stations.

Dr. Duncan, Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Union, writes: "I am amazed at the extent of your efforts for Indian relief. It is a most blessed work and the Lord will reward you for this service to the sick and starving. Our missionaries will be only too happy to co-operate with you." Dr. A. McLean, Secretary of the Missionary Board of the Church of the Disciples, writes us: "Our missionaries are living on two meals a day, and giving the rest to the starving people. I believe THE CHRISTIAN HERALD never did a better work than when it undertook to send relief to the starving people of India."

A Veteran Missionary.

Rev. Geo. T. Washburn, D.D., whose portrait we publish on this page, has done nearly forty years of hard service in the cause of missions in India and few men not actually born in the country know its condition so thoroughly. He with Mrs. Washburn went to India in 1859 as missionaries of the American Board. They joined the Madura Mission and for ten years had charge of a district comprising numerous villages in which there were Christian congregations. The two missionaries entered energetically into the work, conducting schools and evangelistic services among the villagers. At the close of this period there was need of help at Pasumalai, the centre of the educational work of the mission, and Dr. Washburn was invited to take the position. He has remained at that post with occasional visits to the United States to the present time.

FAMINE FUND NOTES.

The details of the $40,000 just cabled from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund to our American Missionaries in India, will appear in next week's issue.

Contributions to the India Fund from people who give neither State nor town, will be acknowledged next week, as in this week's paper we acknowledge only those whose addresses are known.

Among the contributions to India, lately received, is one of $1,000 sent by a missionary society in the West, with the express stipulation that the names of the givers be not published, and that the gift be cabled to our faithful missionaries in India. Both conditions will be observed, although it would have given us pleasure to name the generous donors.

live in India for nearly forty years. I have seen two famines, terrible in their results, but neither of them as widespread as the present one, and I have seen just as this one was coming on, and have been in charge of a camp of famine sufferers and an orphanage of orphans, and have distributed thousands of dollars in food, grain, clothing, and other aid. I have seen dead men on the road, starved to death, and I have seen a woman, at least, who was just crawling from her village to my house, where doles of rice and money were being distributed, receive her dole of money, stagger a few steps down the road, and fall, and die before sustenance could be obtained. And yet, neither of these famines was so wide spread in extent, nor so threatening in its approach, and I have no reason to believe, so deadly in its results as the present one.

But the man to report as an eye-witness of starvation, is not a gentleman from the city of Bombay. I can understand Mr. Kittredge, living in Bombay, the centre of government resource, commerce, and where grain is at hand, and where foreign and native community is so stirred to philanthropic activity, to say, should see no deaths that he could attribute to bare hunger and nothing more. The most of those who die of famine are not fortunate enough to escape the intervention of any and every disease that will die of starvation. They die of cholera, dysentery, and fever, and a dozen complaints which unwholesome and unnatural food and reduced food give occasion to. I have nursed hundreds of them die, notwithstanding care and appropriate medication.

Mr. Kittredge had traveled through India, a little remote from railroads, and where food can with difficulty be obtained, he would have been obliged to believe his statement in regard to those districts, or to prove it to the satisfaction of the Indian public, who are giving relief to people whom they believe to be dying of starvation. Native people die for love of giving to Pariahs and other outcasts, among whom the severest famine exists; and yet natives, civilians, Christians, and heathen, all are giving by the hundreds and thousands of rupees, to aid to relieve those whom the Indian newspapers and the government officers tell us are starving.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER.

Sunday School Lesson for June 27. Golden Text: Matt. 24: 14. The Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations.

THREE groups of four lessons each are contained in our quarter's review. Of the first four, three are concerned with Peter and his doings, and one with the formation of the Antioch church; the second four are occupied with Paul's ministry and travels; the third four deal with certain ethical and doctrinal matters. The first two groups are historical, and we learn from them how the Church behaved under the storm of persecution which followed the martyrdom of Stephen. One would have expected that the scattering of the first feeble followers of Christ would have extinguished the dim, flickering light of the new faith. Some of the members of the Church had seen the Lord and heard his gracious words, but the larger number had heard of him only through his Apostles. Separated from each other, with no written record of the Gospel, there was a danger that they would lose interest in Christ and his work. Our quarter's lessons are interesting, if for no other reason, because they show how this danger which menaced the infant faith was averted. This light was not to be hid under a bushel. As we read, we accept the test of Gamaliel: (Acts 5: 38). "If this counsel or this work be of men it will come to naught; but if it be of God ye cannot overthrow it." At this day there are four hundred millions of Christians and their numbers are increasing in every generation. That is the issue of the Rabbi's test.

Thirteen of the twenty years covered by the Book of Acts are occupied by the first two groups of lessons. They are historical, but it is history of the Scriptural order. It is not a mere recital of facts and events, but history written with a purpose. There is spiritual teaching all along the course. Luke, who undoubtedly wrote the book, is less concerned about making a complete narrative, than in setting down such facts as will show the character of the Apostles' teaching and the circumstances which were, in his view, most momentous to the progress and development of the Church. We should have been glad to know many things about the period which he does not disclose. We would like to know how the mother church in Jerusalem conducted its affairs, where it worshipped, how it was governed, and many other things about which our historian is silent. But none of these matters could have helped us as the history which Luke wrote has helped us. It would seem as if Luke's design was to leave the future church free to take the form that might suit it best. Uniformity surely was not sought. No directions are given anywhere as to church government, or manner of worship. The Holy Spirit was given; faith in Christ and union with him were insisted upon, and all the details were left to development. The great tree which Christ saw growing from the smallest of seeds (Matt. 13: 32) was not to be fettered in its growth. But it was to grow rapidly. At the end of these thirteen years its branches covered the region of Asia Minor and already the seeds had been carried by travellers who had been converted into Europe.

The first group of four lessons comprises: Peter working miracles; Peter preaching to Gentiles; Peter delivered from prison; and the planting of the Church at Antioch in Syria. The mighty power which Christ had imparted to his people, and which the Holy Spirit had quickened into vigorous life, was making itself manifest. These unlettered, uneducated men were not to stand idle, nor to keep the light to themselves. They had probably not the faintest conception of what Christianity was to be to the world; but they could testify and this they did. They declared what they personally knew by experience, and there was no ambiguity about their utterances. All the diffidence and uncertainty which had characterized them during the life of their Lord, disappeared and they spoke and acted with boldness and power.

It was, however, in the period covered by the second group of lessons that the era of expansion really came. It is significant that it did not originate in the mother church at Jerusalem, but at Antioch, the youngest and most mixed, racially, of the churches. Not only did Antioch give to the followers of Christ the name by which they have ever since been known, but it initiated the new movement through which it has since developed. Antioch sent out missionaries. That fact reveals the character of the Church. The people there fasted and prayed; and it was therefore a devotional church. The result was not abortive. It did not end only in increased piety, but in a practical, aggressive activity. Here Paul and James Tongue; Paul's Advice to Timothy; and Personal Responsibility. These lessons shed light on the church life of the period by the glimpse they give us of the questions which were then occupying the Christian mind. Some of these questions have changed their form since that time, but the principles laid down by the Bible writers are so broad that they can be applied to the present situation. They all indicate the necessity of a true spiritual union with Christ and of a broad tolerance as to external rites, ceremonies and observances.

Whosoever believeth. (Acts 10: 43.) Peter had learned his lesson. God had taught him as he admitted not to call anything common or unclean. Having learned this much, "Whosoever" was a good word to use. Sailer, afterwards Bishop of Regensburg, was preaching on one occasion in a country church, the rector of which laid great stress on rites and ceremonies. Sailer preached salvation to all who would repent and believe. The rector, at the conclusion, announced that he would preach himself in the evening as Sailer had opened the doors of heaven much too wide. "He is an excellent hand at bandages," the rector added, "but a poor operator." Sailer was a humble man and took the reproof in good part. "It may be so," he said, "but there are more people cured by the bandage than the knife."

Believed and turned to the Lord (Acts 11: 21). "I remember," says a clergyman, "while at college receiving an invitation from the great man of the county to his house to a dinner, and to see some choice

Napoleonic wars. On the day before Easter Sunday, in 1799, the town of kirche was horror-stricken by seeing a French army of 18,000 men, under Massena, come against it. The town council was hastily summoned to decide what should be done. Some members urged immediate surrender, others urged measure of defence, and others some different, but all were desperate. The meeting broke up with nothing done each member was instructed to be the following morning. "To-morrow said the old dean, 'is Easter Sunday have been reckoning our own streets and have found it to be nothing. I turn to God. Let us have service as usual and beseech God to deliver us.'" Council agreed, and at dawn the bells of every steeple rang out the joyous tones that greeted the Easter morn. Massena heard the joy-bells, and asked what occurred. His officers could not tell but the rumor spread that in the night the Austrians had come to the relief of the town. In alarm, Massena broke up camp, and before the bells had ceased ringing, the French army was in full retreat. God had answered prayer.

To bridle the whole body. (James 3: 7.) "Why do you look so weary?" said a Christian friend, who was addressing a Christian friend, who was saying, "How do you think a man would be for a long time he had been keeping order and taming two falcons, two hawks, a snake and a lion, and I had to wait on a sick man? I should think that a man who had been doing all that, would be very tired." "Duties," said the Christian, "are quite harassing. Two falcons would give me no more trouble than I take to keep eyes, lest they rest on things that would be hurtful to my salvation; two hares need no more restraint than do men that are quick to run after evil; two would not be more difficult to train my hands have been in God's service, a snake could not do more mischief than the tongue would do if it were not kept under guard; and no lion is so difficult to subdue as my heart with which I have waited for years. The sick man I have waited on is myself and I have no ease in supplying my own wants."

How great a matter a little fire kindleth. (Jas. 3: 5.) A newspaper account of a terrible accident at Cincinnati was headed "An inch of iron the cause of fatal terror." The account goes on to describe the accident on the inclined plane at Cincinnati, by which several were killed as many wounded. "The cause of the wreck was a little piece of iron not more than an inch long that became lodged in the cut-off valve, and was found in the morning by the men who took the machinery apart. How it came there, no one knows. It was not broken off from the surrounding machinery, as far as even been ascertained. By occupying space required for the rod to move so disarranged the machinery as to make it impossible for the engineer to stop the steam." So there are momentous actions in life, seemingly small and insignificant in themselves. But the soul started on some downward track; moment the momentum increases; when effort is made, it is found that the power of control over the will is lost and the result is spiritual and eternal disaster.

He that in these things serveth is acceptable. (Rom. 14: 8.) This general rule covering the whole life, find very sincere Christians in the churches. They do not agree as to the form of worship, nor the style of government, nor many other things when their hearts are right with God are accepted of him in spite of their differences. When a governess was wanted for the children of George III. of England, a certain Scotch lady named Campbell, was recommended to the King, sent for her and told her that he proposed to appoint her to that lucrative and honorable position. She was very modest and told the King that the royal chamberlain should be taught many accomplishments about which she was ignorant and advised him to appoint some more learned lady to the post. "Madam," he said, "I wish you to accept the position because you are a good woman. We can hire professors to teach the things you have mentioned, but I want a right-principled person to have charge of the children. I can easily buy accomplishments, but I cannot buy principles."

could meet on common ground. Here was the faith Paul commended, issuing in the works that James demanded. This is the kind of revival that brings forth great things.

In the Antioch Church, it was not only the new movement that was momentous, but the character of the men commissioned. Paul and Barnabas were called to the van. The new impetus came from the two men, and finally from one of the two. That impetus was to be felt through the centuries. Modern Christianity is what Paul made it. In him the infant Church found the guide it needed to attain the conquest of the world. He brought to his work intense piety, zeal and profound scholarship. It was he who most fully apprehended the principles of Christ's mission and showed the significance of the record of the Gospels. From him we learn, as the other Apostles could not teach us, how Christianity was the development and the consummation of Judaism. He showed that the old religion contained the kernel which, stripped of its husk, would grow to the tree which should spread its branches through the whole earth. The simple narratives of the Gospel were necessary to give us the portraiture of the Christ; but it is to Paul's epistles that we go for the theology that is the body to the spirit. Our second group of four lessons introduces to us this remarkable man, beginning his missionary career; preaching to the Jews; preaching to the Gentiles; and going to Jerusalem to win for the Church its freedom.

The third group comprises the lessons on: Faith and Works; Sins of the souvenirs of travel. He had been on a tour around the world, and thinking that we young men would be interested in his curiosities, he sent us a general invitation and added the dinner as an attraction to young men who in those days did not often get a good dinner. There were two parties of us, and some friends had lent us vehicles. We drove away together in high spirits. It was a lovely day and the road led under great trees and through a beautiful country. The other vehicle got ahead of the one I was in and was lost to sight. Presently we met a man who seemed to belong to that neighborhood, and we asked him how far it was to the squire's mansion. He said we were on the wrong road. We should have turned out about a mile farther back. We turned around and drove back, took the turning described, and reached the mansion in due course. But the other party did not come. When we returned to college at night we found that they, too, had met the countryman and had inquired of him, as we did. But they did not turn back. They were enjoying the pleasant drive, and they thought there would be a turning farther on that would lead them to our host's mansion. I have often thought how like this is to the way the Gospel message is treated. There are many who believe, but do not turn, and they never get to heaven."

The Lord hath sent his angel and hath delivered me. (Acts 12: 11.) Deliverance comes in many and strange ways. For God has all nature at his disposal and can use his own means to work his will, when he desires to deliver his children. One remarkable instance occurred during the

GENERAL VIEW OF MOUNT HERMON, NORTHFIELD, MASS.

NORTHFIELD COUNCILS.

Moody's Arrangements for the Entertainment of Christian Young People and Christian Workers During the Summer.

WHAT is an Evangelist's vacation? Ideas differ on the question. Mr. Moody's notion of a vacation may be learned from the programme he has issued of the meetings which are to be held at Northfield during the next three months. For sixteen years past, the summer at Northfield has been a season of spiritual preparation. It has been Mr. Moody's custom to gather around him Christian workers in various fields, and in the charmment of the lovely country-resort to give sweet counsel with them. A man as Mr. Moody usually is during the months of the year, preaching almost every day, and often twice a day, might have expected to spend his vacation in a season of recreation as different as from his ordinary way of life. He would not be happy or contented in any way. He suspends his ordinary life only to get new strength to re-enter it. Especially does he seek in his vacation to be renewed in his spiritual power, and it is to this that his vacation is devoted. There is even in Christ's life when he withdrew to a desert place and rest a while, such an invitation that the great Master addresses to those who, like him, are laboring for the redemption of the world. Many have accepted his invitation in bygone years, who have come to Northfield to find the charming retreat strength-of body and soul for their work, with increased faith and their zeal increased. In many far-off cities and country places, the impetus gained under the shade of those Northfield trees has been the source of the unction and power of Gospel ministry and manifold activities. Visitors come to Northfield in response to bring together at the same place workers of the same character. On the part of the group from the colleges will be students from the seats of learning in this and other lands who are preparing for the pulpit, or the learned professors, will meet in conference and Bible study Meetings are held in the Auditorium or in the open air, morning and evening, as in former years, and the afternoon are given to recreation. Among the eminent professors who have promised to join the young men and assist in the informal discussions that will take place, are: Dr. F. L. Patton, President of Princeton; Rev. Alexander McKenzie, D.D., of Cambridge, and Dr. Henry Van Dyke and Dr. A. F. Schaffner, of New York. All information about this Conference may be obtained from Mr. H. W. Georgi, 40 East Twenty-third Street, New York.

Following this Conference will come an assembly of young women, beginning July 9. The specific aim of this Convention is to train college women for leadership in organized Christian work among their fellow students; to consider the problems of Christian work among city young women; to give practical direction to missionary work, and to deepen spiritual life. Dr. A. T. Pierson, Dr. R. A. Torrey, Mr. John R. Mott, Mr. R. E. Lewis, of the Student Volunteer movement; Mrs. J. S. Norvell, late of China, and Miss E. K. Price, of the Y. W. C. A., of Chicago, will take part in this Conference. It will continue about two weeks, and inquiries about it may be sent to Miss Carrie B. Wilson, 126 State St., Chicago.

A third Convention, to meet July 29, will be that of Christian Workers, which is one of the oldest Northfield gatherings. In these meetings the major Christian doctrines are presented by able Bible students; plans and methods of Christian work are discussed by the clergy and layworkers; various Christian enterprises are represented, and the promoting and deepening of the spiritual life is especially sought. The following speakers and teachers are expected among others: Rev. Geo. H. C. McGregor, London; Rev. Campbell Morgan, Birmingham, England; Bishop Newman, Washington, D. C.; Mr. W. H. Stanes and Mr. V. D. David, the Tamil evangelist, India; Dr. H. C. Mabie, Boston; Rev. A. C. Dixon, Brooklyn; Rev. R. A. Torrey, Chicago, and Rev. C. L. Scofield, Northfield.

Besides these, there will be a Young Men's Christian Association encampment, open during the months of July and NORTHFIELD AUDITORIUM.

August. The camp will be on the lower slope of Notch Mountain, within easy reach of the auditorium. Mr. Moody acts as general host and will participate in all the Conventions. It is impossible to exaggerate the benefits which have been derived in past years from these seasons of peaceful retirement, when the servants of Christ meditate together on the truths of Christianity and gain new power from the endowment of the Holy Spirit.

Was this the Oldest Sunday School?

It is generally claimed that the first Sunday School, in the modern sense of the term, was that established by Robert Raikes of England. This, however, is disputed by Rev. W. T. Scott in an article in the Ladies' Home Journal. He asserts that John Wesley established the first Sunday School at Savannah, Ga. In connection with his other labors, which were indeed prodigious, Wesley soon after his arrival in Georgia, in 1736, began to provide for the Sunday School instruction of the children of the parish. His devotion to children at times almost amounted to infatuation. Children were likewise equally attached to him, as shown in their intercourse with him. Both on week-days and Sabbaths he gave no little attention to educational work. As a preliminary labor on the Sabbath, before the evening service, he required them to convene in the church, at which time he catechised them thoroughly and furnished them with additional teaching from the Bible itself.

AN AIRING FOR TENEMENT BABIES—A SCENE ON THE NEW YORK DOCKS

In the present Wesleyan Memorial Church in Savannah, Georgia, there is a Sunday School room into which hundreds of children crowd for Sunday instruction. The original class was less in number, but it was unquestionably the first Sunday School in the world. When taught by Wesley it numbered between sixty and seventy-five scholars, but from all accounts there were few, if any, Indian boys in his classes.

A very high authority, Sir Charles Reed, M. P., LL.D., of England, is clearly of the Mont-Lawn Ready to Open.

Its Gates will Swing Wide Next Week for Our Little Tenement Waifs.

HERE are hundreds of pale-faced little children, living in the New York tenements, up hot alleys and in stuffy, ill-ventilated courts, who are counting the days that must elapse before the opening of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. Opening day is with them always a big annual event since it ushers in the pleasant season of summer outings, when they can leave the hot pavements and foul-smelling slums behind, and luxuriate amid the flowers, the cool woods and the thousand other attractions of the country. As for the Home itself, it never looked lovelier than now. The surrounding woods are alive with sweet songsters, and the flowers are nodding in readiness for little hands to pick them and weave them into garlands or bunch them into "posies." All the swings are up and the grass on the wide-spreading lawn has been trimmed and looks like a great velvet carpet.

Our little chapel, where the sweet childish voices have been raised so often in songs of praise, looks very inviting; the dormitories are cool and sweet with their snowy coverlets and pillows, and in the large dining-hall one seems to hear a faint echo of the merry clatter that fills the place when the family of some two hundred and odd boys and girls are at meals. Outside on the east lawn, the great marquee tent has been spread and soon it will be alive with as gay and happy an assembly as ever gathered under the canvas. Matron Collins and her staff of workers have made the Home so bright and cheerful, so clean and wholesome looking that it will cost the little folks many a pang to tear themselves away from it when they set their faces cityward again.

Although the Spring has been a cool one, New York has already had a touch of torrid weather and the usual summer scenes of children crowding about the docks and public squares can already be witnessed. They are glad to go anywhere to escape the close, enervating heat of the crowded tenements. Our photographer has shown (in the illustration on this page), how some of the future candidates for a ten-day stay at Mont-Lawn pass the hot June afternoons and evenings. Once in the country, well fed, well housed and slept, and kindly treated, these little ones will be real boys and girls for a time and will get as near to nature and her joys as it is possible to come. The first contingent will go to the Home within a few days.

Partnership in Religion.

HUGH MILLER says he wondered how the nailmakers in England could drive the nailmakers of Cromarty from the market, until he found that the men of Cromarty had to compete with the English men and women both; that is, that the women-folk as well as the men-folk were engaged in this manufacture. It is just so in religion; the man who has the help of his women-folk in religion will outdistance all competition not so favored. God made woman to be a helpmeet for man in religion, as Burns expresses it of life: to climb Zion's hill together. It is hard singing alone. In harmony two voices encourage each other. And wife and husband together can always beat the devil, so to speak, as to family religion. They can drown him with singing.

COMMUNITY OF PROFIT.

In partnership, this is essential. There may or may not be community of money, goods, labor or skill. One may give the money, another the plant, another the labor, and a fourth the skill, but whatever the profit, in order to partnership that must be common. It is so with religion in the family: the benefits cannot be appropriated by husband or wife. They are for the family. How often you hear a man say, "My wife does the religion for this family." But, that does not make family religion. There is no partnership, there is no community of profit. Even the children suffer. There cannot be silent partners in this partnership.

SILENT PARTNERSHIP.

This is sometimes attempted in family religion. But, in silent partnership, capital is furnished. What is the capital of the silent partner in religion? Well, the money to pay the pew-rent, the benevolent contributions, any other contingent expenses. This is the usual interpretation. The husband says to his wife: "You create the religious atmosphere, do the praying for the children, bring them up in the adoration of the Lord, and I will pay the bills." But does such capital get into the partnership? Does not gift, money, need to be secured by prayer? Can money be set over a great spiritual vision, a spiritual example, spiritual life? How does God who is co-partner reckon this attempt at silent partnership?

FOR BETTER OR WORSE.

Well, this contract implies that each partner shall do his best, and that the two shall stand the storm of fate together.

whatever that may be. It is a contract that closes only with life. Some people select their marriage companions with as much carelessness as they would select a partner in a dance. In the dance of life sometimes the measure is a very difficult one, and the partners do not keep step to it or to each other; sometimes the music stops or changes into a minor. They are no longer partners gliding across a waxed and polished floor, but climbing an uphill road, or even walking together to a secluded spot, where is uttered the phrase: "Dust to dust." That was in the contract: one of its implications. For better or worse!

"JOHN ANDERSON MY JO."

We regard that as about the sweetest love song ever written. The partners have got along into the sixties or seventies. The almond tree is in blossom. The daughters of music are brought low. Those that look out at the windows are darkened. There is rheumatism in the case. But neither wishes the partnership dissolved. They have had children in the home-nest, but these have taken to themselves wings and builded themselves other nests. There is little for them to do. The strong men have bowed themselves. Other shoulders have taken the burdens. Is there still profit in the partnership? Ay, they say to each other with the poet:

Grow old along with me,
The best is yet to be,
The rest for which the first was made.

Executive Good Manners.

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY means to keep the peace with the other branches of the Government. We will guarantee that if at the end of his four years of office any member of the House, any Senator is out of sorts with him, it will not be the President's fault. Evidently, he does not mean to make machine appointments. Take the new representatives of this Government to England and France, the best gifts of that kind in the President's power, they had no political backing. And, yet, when first mentioned, they approved themselves as ideal appointments. And when Mr. Platt has a candidate, it is Andrew D. White for Germany. The high tone of the President communicates itself to the political leaders. What do politics owe to Andrew D. White? The country owes him a debt; not a party.

The people who elect the different Departments of Government have a claim upon them, as to good manners. A surly or ungentelemanly official, endangers public interests. The collision between the two great Republican leaders, a few years since, was the indirect cause of the assassination of a President. It is not too much to say, that in the management of public affairs, all personal considerations should be suppressed, or waived. What right has the Chief Executive, or a member of the House or the Senate to allow public business to be arrested or impeded, because he has a personal difference with some other public official? It is just as immoral in him as to allow a battle to fail, simply to spite a brother officer.

Theologians find the need of a Trinity in their systems of theology. This Trinity works harmoniously; each divine person fulfilling his own function in the salvation of men; else, there would be nothing done. There is something like it in human government. The Executive, the Legislative, and the Judiciary Departments need to work in unity. The people inform the law-makers what laws they want. Their Representatives are elected to make them. The Judges pronounce upon their constitutionality. The Executive sees they are carried into effect. And so we have a government. There is no other way of securing one. The Executive alone is not the Government; nor the Law makers alone; nor the Judiciary. But, the Trinity which embraces them all is the Government.

The Worship of the Serpent.

THE serpent and the tree! That is the conjunction we find in every race and every faith. Indeed it may be safely asserted of all false religions "the trail of the serpent is over them." "Wherever the devil has reigned," says Bishop Stillington, "there also, has the serpent been held in veneration; either as god, oracle, or charm. And as man fell by the serpent, so also by his adoration of it, he has continued to fall, even unto the present day."

It is undoubtedly the oldest of all idolatries. Bel, or Obel, "Serpent Lord" was a favorite god of the Babylonians, Assyrians, Canaanites, and of all the countries lying between the Great Sea and the Euphrates; and the history of Bel and the Dragon, in the Apocrypha, is a vivid picture of the worship of Bel, in the days of Daniel. A serpent coiled at the root of a tree, is the design of the oldest Tyrian medals; and eleven cities of Asia Minor, had the serpent for an ensign. Tradition says that St. Philip killed the great serpent, which the people of Hierapolis worshipped by his prayers; and founded there, one of the earliest Christian churches.

Persian mythology represents the good and the evil principles of life, by two serpents; and Cashmere, had at least seven hundred places where this creature was worshipped; as for China, the serpent, under the name of the Dragon, intersects every phase of religion, politics, social and domestic life. On the sceptre and diadem of the emperor, on the pots and clothing of the humblest citizen it is found.

Hindustan gave to serpent worship a grim and awful power. The merciless Juggernaut is a seven-headed dragon; and the fifth day of the month Sravana is "sacred to the gods in the form of serpents." Coming westward, we find that Egypt, the mother of all superstitions, has always venerated the serpent. Not fifty years ago, Bishop Pococke saw the worship of the serpent "Heredy" at Raigny, in which worship he says "both Christians and Turks believe." If we look through Greek and Roman mythologies, we shall be startled at the prominence given to the serpent, and it is further to be noted, that many of their great men gloried in the idea that they were the sons of serpents.

There is little need to enlarge on the terrible prominence given in Scandinavian mythologies to the serpent. To this god, our own British and Saxon ancestors offered up their bloody rites; and Dr. Deane thinks that it was against serpent-worship rather than serpents themselves, that St. Patrick exercised his apostolic zeal. The royal standard of Denmark was a serpent; and in Poland, the idolatry lingered until Jerome of Prague ordered the serpents kept as household deities, to be burned. In Italy as late as A.D. 688, the Bishop of Benevento melted into a sacramental chalice a golden serpent which the people had worshipped.

In America the traces of this universal idolatry are equally prominent. Mexico had her serpent god, and even the purer Sabianism of Peru annually offered a human sacrifice to the serpent. The great mounds of Ohio and Iowa are really serpent images; and Purchas in his Pilgrimage, says he found among the Virginian Indians the snake-head dress of their priests to be almost similar to those worn by the priests of Isis and Bacchus. And anyone who is much among the Southern negroes of this very day may find many traces of this ancient idolatry mingling with the Christian creeds they profess.

In the Old Testament the serpent is too fatally evident. It lies there at the foundation of all sin and sorrow and suffering, and the Jews showed the strangest infatuation for this worship, even though it demanded the sacrifice of their children. Not until the days of Hezekiah did they cease to burn incense unto the memorial brazen serpent; and even during the first centuries of Christianity, there were such frequent blendings of this emblem in religious, sepulchral, and personal adornments, that Clemens passionately reproved Christian women for wearing bracelets and jewels fashioned in the likeness of this creature, a fault that Christians of the present day are by no means guiltless of, and which in some years easily within the memory has amounted to a decided fashion.

The mass of information on this subject is simply stupendous and covers every nation in every era of the world's history. How shall we account for this universal and persistent idolatry of a creature neither beautiful, wise, nor beneficent? Only on the ground that the Mosaic record is a true, a literally true, record. Then the history of serpent-worship is the history of the unity of the human race, the history of that mighty warfare which began when enmity was put between the woman and the serpent, and which shall only end when "that old serpent, which is the Devil, shall be bound so that he deceive the nations no more." The day arrives! For serpent worship has now fled into the darkest corners of the earth, where are still the habitations of cruelty; and the Cross, which is the Tree of Life, has been planted for the healing of the nations.

BRIEF NOTES.

Dr. S. D. Tonge, of Laconia, N.H., is to acknowledge on his behalf, the sum of $1000 sent to him for distribution among the veterans by J. A. H., Veteran's Home, Waupaca, Wis.

The attendance of ministers at the Leyland Conference, which is to open in Leyland, on July 20th, is expected to be very large. Some 1,200 applications have already been received.

Rev. F. B. Meyer has accepted the invitation of many ministers to give a series of lectures in New York, Boston and other cities. His lectures, however, will not permit of his return before midwinter.

The California Episcopate is to have a Cathedral, the first steps toward which have been taken in San Francisco. It will be a missionary work, the organization known as the Mission of the Good Samaritan being turned as a nucleus for that purpose.

Mrs. Florence Babbitt, an energetic worker of the Ladies Society of St. Luke's Church, Detroit, Mich., is doing an excellent mission in placing Bibles, prayer-books and hymnals in various spots along the lines of railroad in Michigan, at convenient places where they may be used by waiting passengers.

The permanent Committee on Arbitration appointed by the National Arbitration Commission has issued an appeal to the American people, testing against the rejection by the Senate of the International Arbitration Treaty, and asking labor earnestly to the end that the will of the people concerning arbitration may be embodied in appropriate legislation.

Dr. Lawes, the well-known missionary to New Guinea, gives a most cheering account of progress that has been made in that island the last twenty-two years. "There are no churches and schools in places where the darkness and savagery existed; there are scholars in connection with these schools, men and women are professed followers of Christ."

The opening of the Auditorium at Grove, N. J., for the season, is fixed for July 1st. Holiness meetings will be held daily in the building, led by Rev. J. R. Daniels. The people's meeting will be held daily at 9 A.M. Rev. C. H. Yatman. Dr. Hanlon will give Bible class every Sunday at 2:30 P.M. and man will preach at 7:30 P.M.

The City of Toronto, Can., has now three local battles on the question of Sunday cars. In January, 1892, and August, 1897, Sunday car party won, but last month the car party mustered all their available resources to outvote the opponents of Sunday car travel by 321 majority. The result is said to be a surprise to the advocates of a quick end of the Lord's day in the old Canada.

The Board of Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, reports total for the past year as $478,327, including $244,400 for foreign missions, an increase of $7,103; $1,000,000 for domestic missions; $18,000 by the Woman's and Home Mission Society, and $1,000,000 by the Woman's Foreign Mission Board. In foreign fields the Board has 105 missions (including wives); and 268 native helpers.

Judge Sheldon of the Suffolk (Mass.) Court, in rendering a decision on a case in Boston, announced as a dictum of the court that "theosophy is not a religion." This it appears, is accepted by the leaders of the Theosophical Society, one of the foremost of the "new religions." It is not a religion, but a superstition. Having neither form nor definition, both object and classification.

Rev. Alexander MacLaren, the celebrated English divine, has recently been offered the Regent's Park by the co-pastorate of Bloomsbury Church, has, however, refused the tempting honor to continue a life of Christian activity in his present congregation. Dr. MacLaren is highly honored by the Free Church of Scotland in the completion of his half century of ministry.

In a recent statistical compilation, the relative numerical strength of the Protestant denominations, H. K. Carroll gives these comparative figures: Methodists (colored and white), 5,653,289; Baptists, 4,153,387; Presbyterians, 1,400,346; Lutherans, 1,420,057; Episcopalians, 1,003,672; P. E. Congregationalists, 577,000; Last year the gain was: Methodist Baptists, 85,318; Disciples, 80,000; Congregationalists, 20,000; Episcopalians, 19,430.

The Rev. David S. Schaff has been recently elected to the chair of church history at the University of Halle, Germany. He is the son of Prof. Philip Schaff, who was president of the American committee on Bible revision in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. The Rev. David Schaff has been identified with his father's literary enterprise as co-editor of Schaff & Herzog's encyclopedia and other standard works.

Rev. William James is opening his new season at Belle Isle, Conn., for Christian work this season. Last year many a tired laborer in city slums enjoyed a one or two rest at this pleasant resort. A cordial welcome, as far as the accommodations and the permit to missionaries and workers who are to pay for their board. Mr. James would receive contributions from friends to enable him to receive many more of these worthy guests. They may be sent to him at Box 61, Belle Isle, Conn.

Rev. John Henry Barrows, D.D., just returned from a tour in India, in his observations, makes special note of the fact that the harshest criticisms of missionaries come not from non-Christians and not from Europeans and Americans. He says that the most ridiculous appears the claim sometimes made by the Brahman caste, that they are Christians. Have I not seen a Brahman in the bazaars of Benares? Have I not seen a whole row of Christian Brahman preachers of a native church in Ahmednagar, not sat for an hour in Poona with a Brahman told me the story of his conversion to Christianity. Have I not listened to addresses from natives in India, addresses so able and vigorous I longed to have such men and women in our churches in America?

NEWSPAPER

Memorial of a Philanthropist.

WISE, far-sighted benevolence such as Peter Cooper practised in New York could not go unrecognized without ingratitude. The good old man may, as reported, have been content to let his memorial of himself besides the person that bears his name, but the people who were aided by his benefaction would not rest satisfied until a memorial of the philanthropist was made. A committee to receive contributions was organized soon after his death, and it was interesting to witness many of the poor who had profited by educational facilities Peter Cooper's benevolence had provided, came to add mites to the fund. A series of unforeseen accidents delayed the realization of the project, but at last the memorial is in place and has been unveiled with appropriate ceremonies. It consists of a statue of the philanthropist by the sculptor, Mr. St. Gaudens, with a pedestal and accessories designed by Mr. St. Gaudens, the architect. It stands appropriately in the little triangular garden on the roof of Cooper Union, where it will be seen by the people whom he loved and whom he planned to help. At the exercises preliminary to the unveiling of the statue many of his descendants were present, and it was announced that by the generosity the work commenced by the founder of the Institute would be continued and extended and that permanent provision had been made for its perpetuation. The well-known story of the foundation of Cooper Union was told anew and the poetic words of the grand old man who had never been able to forget his struggles to get an education told how he had determined that if ever he succeeded in business he would provide for the aspiring poor boys and girls of his native city the opportunity for education so ardently longed in his own life. When wealth came to him, he did not forget his resolve, but planted his personal institution right in the heart of the district where such boys and girls and his later years were gladdened by seeing how thoroughly it was appreciated and how well it was used. When he went to his grave in his ninety-third year, he had proved the truth of the wise declaration as to the wisdom that he sought all his life:

"The end of days is in her right hand; and in her left, riches and honor." (Prov. 3: 16.)

South American Pest.

Entomologists are concerned about the arrival in Philadelphia of a new bug which has been found in their collections and is by all accounts a desirable importation. Specimens were taken from the hold of the steamer Albertina, from Rosario, Argentina, unloading a cargo of bones collected from the great slaughter houses in Argentina. The bugs have several legs, are covered with hair and are extremely minute in appearance. Captain Dill, master of the Albertina, was warned at the last of the destructive nature of the pest, and, acting on the advice of the entomologists, had the hold of his vessel whitewashed, using ten barrels of quicklime, which was stirred nearly a hundred times with arsenic. The officers of the vessel were confident that the woodwork of the vessel would have been so eaten that the vessel would have been lost at sea before reaching this port had it not been for this precaution. This is shown by the condition of pieces of timber which were not treated with arsenic, and which were found to be honeycombed with the pest. The most cases full of the living larvae of the pest. Doubtless, precautions were taken to prevent their spread throughout the country. Everyone understands how much mischief may be done by destructive creatures that can eat bones and wood. It would be well if we were similarly on our guard against the entrance and spread of pernicious doctrines and books and all forms of sin which destroy the very soul so that their victims cry as did the patriarch:

"I am like a rotten thing that consumeth, like a garment that is moth-eaten." (Job 13: 23.)

Fighting Sailors Forget Duty.

A free fight among a crew on board a wrecking vessel came near causing the death of a diver on June 4, near Beach Haven, N. J. The captain of the vessel put on his leaden boots and his diver's suit to go down to examine the position of a wrecked vessel. He had scarcely reached bottom and commenced his work when a dispute arose on deck. One of the sailors objected to the assumption of authority on the part of the mate, whom the captain had placed in command while he was absent. The two men roundly abused each other, and eventually came to blows. The sympathies of the crew were divided, and while some took the part of the mate, others defended the sailor. Soon all of the crew were engaged in the fight, and even the man who was working the pump which kept the submerged captain supplied with air, took a hand in the struggle. He was fighting as fiercely as the others, when the situation of the captain dawned on his mind. He called on the crew to leave off fighting and help him draw the captain to the surface. They, too, realized the consequences of their inattention to duty and the unfortunate man was drawn up. He was in a critical condition, and for some time it was feared that life was extinct. They divested him of his diving suit and worked over him for over an hour before he recovered consciousness. They say that he was neglected for only a few minutes, but to the captain, gasping for breath at the bottom of the sea, it seemed like an age that he suffered through the cessation of the pumping. It is a mercy that his life was spared. When strife begins it occupies the attention to the exclusion of other people's dangers. Ministers who are fond of heresy-hunting and disputation often forget this and while they are contending over minor questions souls who need gospel preaching suffer.

"The servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men. . . . That they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil." (II. Tim. 2: 25-26.)

Tired of Exile.

An embezzler for whom search has been made throughout Europe and South America voluntarily surrendered a few days ago to the New York police. Six years ago he was the most trusted employe of a banking and brokerage firm on Broadway, New York. He lived at New Brunswick, New Jersey. His life had been exemplary and his friends in the city and his neighbors in the country all believed him to be a wealthy man. Early in 1891 they were surprised by his suddenly breaking up his home and selling his furniture. It was stated, in explanation, that he was going to Europe for a vacation, and that during his absence his wife and family would board in New York. The man actually did go to Europe, and his employers learned that he never intended coming back. They received a letter from him which he gave to the pilot to mail and which reached them when he was safe in mid-Atlantic, confessing that he was a defaulter, and stating that he had absconded because his wrongdoing could no longer be concealed. They made an examination of his books but found them in good order and with no sign of a shortage. They were coming to the conclusion that he was crazy, when a discovery was made which confirmed his letter. One of their customers sent them instructions how to invest sixty thousand dollars standing to his credit with them, but they found that he had only twenty thousand dollars to his credit. Then it was realized that although the absconding employee's books were apparently correct, he had been taking the money and stock of customers and converting them to his own use. The police were put on his track and European detectives were set to work, but the man eluded them. Finally, when all hope of arresting him was abandoned, the man came of his own accord and gave himself up. He said he was tired of exile and longed to be once more in his own land. It is expected that he will make partial restitution and will submit to a term of punishment, but he appears to be relieved by his surrender. Many a man has had the same sense of relief when he has given up his sins and has cast himself unreservedly on the mercy of God.

He looketh upon men and if any say I have sinned and perverted that which was right and it profited me not, he will deliver his soul and his life shall see the light. (Job 33: 27.)

The Yerkes Telescope Wrecked.

News comes from Wisconsin that the Yerkes telescope, the wonder and glory of the American astronomical world, has had a narrow escape of being ruined. The elevating floor has fallen to the bottom of the great dome, where it lies at an angle of forty-five degrees, with one edge on the floor and the other against the guides that carry the ponderous counter-weights. The workmen say that it will take the whole summer to remove the wreck and put in a new floor. In falling the big wreck stripped away the winding stairway from the carrying column, but happily the fall did not injure the instrument, though it will not be possible to use it until the floor is replaced. The accident is said to be due to bad workmanship in the construction. This is almost inconceivable, as the telescope is of inestimable value, its lens having involved the work of years. That the safety of a thing so precious should have been imperilled by defective work in the flooring on which it rested, is unpardonable. We all realize that the utmost care ought to have been exercised to protect the delicate and invaluable instrument from such a catastrophe, and blame the people who were responsible for the faults of workmanship which made it possible. It is a pity that we do not realize our own responsibility in an analogous case. Although we know how precious the soul is and that its loss is irretrievable, we are at no pains to preserve the body, which is its tenement, from sin which undermines its safety:

Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost? . . . Therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit which are God's. (I. Cor. 6: 19, 20.)

Buried Treasure Unearthed.

An astonishing story of the discovery of buried treasure comes from Jacksonville, Fla. Some months ago a party of men describing themselves as scientists arrived in Florida and settling upon a small island off the coast, began to make a series of excavations. One of the servants of the party was a negro who overheard conversations among the members of the party which convinced him that the object of the search was not purely scientific. He kept a close watch on the party and one night followed them to the woods where they began digging at a place which had been located during the day. After several hours hard work he saw them lift out of the hole a large iron-bound box which when opened, revealed a quantity of gold coins. The negro's cupiditas was excited and the next day, he stole their charts and disappeared. He remained in hiding until the party, helpless without their charts to continue the search, had left the neighborhood. Then he returned and took service with a lumberman near Jacksonville. He fell sick soon afterward and was nursed by the lumberman who won his gratitude by continued kindness. To him the negro told his story and exhibited the stolen charts. The lumberman was incredulous at first, but eventually became eager to prosecute the search. The two went to the island and dug at various places indicated on the charts. At last their efforts were rewarded by the discovery of another chest full of Spanish doubloons. They were anxious to keep their find secret, and decided not to attempt to turn the ancient coins into currency in the neighborhood lest other people should be led to search. The negro proposed to go to Savannah, Ga., with the treasure, for the purpose of exchange, and the lumberman agreed. After waiting for some time for him to return and hearing nothing the lumberman grew anxious about his share of the treasure which he said was worth over $30,000 and told his story, begging that the police make a search for the negro. Suddenly the lumberman, too, disappeared and it is conjectured that by some means he found the negro and secured his share of the money. Since his departure several parties have been digging about the island but being without the charts have not succeeded in finding anything. No one appears to know who buried the money or how the charts were obtained. It is evident, however, that they were prepared by some one who had accurate information and that the only way to find the treasure is to study the charts. It is so with that better treasure which rewards the seeker after spiritual blessings. They succeed who follow the guidance of God's Word:

Search the Scriptures for in them ye think ye have eternal life. (John 5: 39.)

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

TRIPOLI AND ITS PEOPLE. A World-Old Seaport that Stood in Patri- archal Days—Its Present Condition.

S Damascus, the principal city of Syria, was a populous and important centre in the time of Abraham—2,000 years B. C.—so several other Syrian cities are of like antiquity. Aleppo, Beirut, Tripoli were all settled early in the world's history. The last-mentioned is a port forty miles northeast of Beirut. Its buildings are mostly of stone, and the town contains many remains of early and mediæval architecture. It is believed to be one of the oldest cities on the globe, having been founded by the Phœnicians. It has witnessed many vicissitudes, having been repeatedly besieged in the early centuries of the Christian era, affording rich spoil to its enemies. In the twelfth century, during the Crusader wars, it suffered greatly by a protracted siege.

Like most other Eastern cities, Tripoli is cosmopolitan as to population. With thirty odd thousand inhabitants, probably a majority are Greeks, with many Syrians and Moslems, and a few Christians. Visitors to Tripoli are reminded of the Crusades by the fact that at different seasons of the year many pilgrims still pass that way, journeying to the sacred places of the Holy Land. There is an old Crusader castle in the place that looks grimly grand amid its setting of lemon, apricot, orange, and apple trees. Another feature—hardly an attraction—that may interest the visitor, is a penitentiary under Turkish military control, in which many of the most violent and desperate criminals have been confined.

Roaming about the streets of modern Tripoli, and noting its comparative insignificance, one can hardly reconcile the present condition of the city with the traditional claim that it once was one of that splendid group of ports which included Tyre and Sidon, the richest of the ancient East. Dull enough and dead enough are all three now, in contrast with any of our stirring American sea-coast cities or those of Europe; yet there once went out from those venerable shores fleets and great multitudes of seamen, merchants and traders to do business with Carthage, Venice, Cadiz, Alexandria, and the ports of the Nile, some of which have long since passed from magnificence to ruin.

Tripoli is an interesting city in many ways. Here one can study human character in the different nationalities to advantage, and here, with the blue water of the Mediterranean lapping the shores, the traveler can rest awhile with a degree of comfort and enjoyment. There are many places well deserving of a visit in the ruined old city; great volcanic ridges, beautiful fertile vales, and cool, inviting groves, with rich and varied combinations of color that delight the eye.

Fidgety People.

With many people, fidgeting becomes a fixed habit, before they are aware of the fact. It is one that often proves distressing to friends and acquaintances and painful to the victim as well, yet it is exceedingly difficult to overcome. On this subject, a thoughtful writer says: Apart from the fretful temper and ill regulated moral temper which it discovers, it exerts physical and mental effects which are deplorable. The life of the nerves is eaten out by this habit, brain power and heart power, which ought to be used to good purpose, are devoured—gradually gnawed away, by the fretting, corrosions of these spasms of fidgeting. The victim of this habit ought, for the sake of himself as well as for the sake of others, resist and overcome it. Especially where this impatient habit of speech betokens a nervous breakdown, in its incipient stages, it should be remembered that no surer way can be found to hasten the prostration and make it chronic, than through an intemperate and fretful tongue. Time, strength, patience, nerve force, and moral character are all wasted by the fidgets.

Caste Among Christians.

A lady in Centerville, Iowa, writes us: "There is a great deal being said and done in our large cities about poor girls, and homes are opened for them. We wish something could be done to draw out Christian sympathy and respect for those who have to earn their living by sewing or washing in people's kitchens. If these girls who are making an honest effort to support themselves and often to help aged or invalid relatives, could be treated in a way to encourage them in doing right; if they could be made to feel that their work entitles them to the same respect as those that work in other ways, provided they do it well, and that honesty and industry, and virtue are of more value than riches, there would be little need for homes for fallen of cross, tent and satin stitch, in hem, fell, and overseam,—and indeed in all such feats of the needle as were considered essential to a young lady's equipment for life in the youth of our great-grandmothers,—is proved by the careful instruction in the arts of "stitchery" which she bestowed upon her granddaughters. We may also be quite sure that her manners were unexceptional, as such accomplishments then formed a more important part of the education of a young Virginian lady than the circle of the sciences. The Dandridge and other estates upon the Pamunkey were near enough to Williamsburg to allow their owners to enter into the social life of this place, which shared with Annapolis the honor of leading the Virginia fashions of the day. If the English Surveyor of Customs wrote from Annapolis of the extravagance of its inhabitants and the beauty and grace of its women, another traveler about the same period descanted upon the number of coaches that crowded the deep sandy streets of Williamsburg, while the charms of its daughters have more than twice been "sung in song, rehearsed in story."

Value of Female Education.

In our day, the education of girls has become, in a sense, quite as important as that of the boys. With the extension of woman's field of usefulness and the multiplication of female industries, the necessity has arisen of equipping her for the battle of life in a manner that will develop girls. I had a conversation with a young man from a large city. He said if he visited a poor girl who washed in people's kitchens, he could not go with the higher class that separated themselves from the poor. Shame on a Christian nation that looks at things in such a way! If we would all follow the golden rule by doing unto others as we would have them do to us, we would do away with caste in this Christian land of ours."

While what our correspondent writes is unquestionably true in a sense, yet we believe there are very many Christian people in our land who draw no such distinction. They regard all labor as honorable, no matter how humble. It is only among the shallow and worldly portion of society that the poor and uncultured are denied recognition.

Martha Washington's Girlhood.

In her charming volume on Women of Colonial and Revolutionary Times, Anne Hollingsworth Wharton gives this attractive picture of the youth of Martha Dandridge, the little Virginia maid who was destined in later years to become the spouse of Washington:

That little Martha Dandridge could play upon the spinnet, we know, as she spoke, in after life, of giving lessons upon that instrument to her granddaughter; and that she was an apt pupil in the mysteries her best qualities. Mary C. Stetson, a leading authority on the subject, writes: "Whatever trains and develops a young girl into a stronger and nobler womanhood will help her in any position which she may be called upon to fill. In childhood our girls should have the same preliminary training as the boys. They should be encouraged to play with their brothers. Boys grow more gentle and considerate by this association, while the girls gain in vigor and force. Indeed, this exchange of courtesies we find all through life, first in play, next in the co-educational schools, and lastly in the new homes that are made."

"If a daughter is delicate, she should not be crowded with work. Let her education take a longer time. There is no need of hurry. Why cannot the truth be recognized that the years of training are the most beautiful years of life? They are full of hopes and aspirations which beautify the soul even if they are never fully attained. The wise mother will do all in her power to extend this delightful period. A thorough education makes it possible for a young woman to enter almost any occupation she may desire. For those who have been brought up tenderly it is not always pleasant to be compelled to care for themselves, but it is a thousand times better to be able to do so in an emergency than to eat the bread of dependence."

GOD'S BLOSSOMS.

GOD lends white blossoms to the land
To beautify and cheer,
For perfumed buds are fair to view,
And birds' glad songs to hear,
But when the blue sky leaden grows,
And frosts of winter come
Should we rebel because that God
Calls his white blossoms home?

God places by our side oft times
Companions who entwine
Soft silken cords of happy love
About your heart and mind
And when the angel Death swoops down,
And softly whispers "Con-
Should we rebel because our God
Calls his white blossoms home?"

CHILDREN AND MONEY.

THE celebrated divine, Dr. T. Bishop of Winchester, has, at certain times, given much wholesome advice to parents concerning the training of their children, but nothing he has ever written could be more pertinent to the present time than these words upon the need of giving children a proper notion of the value and uses of money.

"Where the one aim of the family is plainly seen to be to be rich; and when the constant business of his talk is on the power and importance of money; his children will inevitably be trained for their father's mammoth ship, and the air of filthy lucre that breathe will insensibly impregnate the moral character. If, on the other hand, they see money treated as a matter of utter indifference; if before the day by day expenses are incurred means to meet them, and the last quarter ever asked about anything is what cost, there will be a tendency in the direction to impair the quickness of moral sense in money matters; general habitual self-indulgence will secure the natural order of things, and for anything, will mean instantly to procure it. No doubt in many cases there are what may be called hereditary ideas about money: some are born others extravagant; and be the circumstances of life what they may, the bias will assert itself from the nursery to the grave. But a great deal may be done by carefully educating children in the value of money as means to an end. There are various ways of doing it, some of them will at first be disagreeable. Different characters must be suitably treated, and an age, which is not suitable for one young person to be with money, might be very unsuitable for another."

"The chief thing, however, that parents should din into their children's memory, and impress on their consciences almost from the first hour they are capable of understanding it, is the mischievousness of debt, and even disgrace that comes with debt. Borrowing seems so easy, lending so natural, and youth is so full of hope, and conscious of integrity only for a short time and payment easily be made; and who need not be afraid of a young man's nature with a hot iron. It is a fault which an inflexible sternness is the kindest, and the only effective remedy. An indulgent easiness in the early years may foster a habit which will analyze the sinews of robust action, reduce ultimately its victim to the temptible condition of being either mendicant or a thief."

Facts for Young Bible Students.

We frequently receive letters inquiring as to the number of times certain words and expressions occur in the Bible. These are generally from young people who give the following compact information for their benefit, trusting that they will serve for future reference: The Bible contains 3,586,489 letters, 773,692 words, 1,189 chapters, and 66 books. The longest chapter is the 119th Psalm, the shortest and middle chapter is the 118th Psalm. The middle verse is the 118th Psalm. The longest verse is in the 8th chapter of Isaiah. The word "and" occurs 46,277 times; the word "the" 1,855 times. The 37th chapter of the 1st book of Kings is the longest chapter of the Old Testament, and the 19th chapter of the 2nd book of Kings is the longest chapter of the New Testament. The shortest chapter is the 11th chapter of the 1st book of John.

PATIENCE.

Us and Benefits and the Considerations which Tend to Promote its Exercise.

Among the qualities that mark differences of character, that of patience must be reckoned one of the chief. Whether it is shown in the endurance of pain, or in bearing reverses of fortune, or in patient associations and environment, or waiting for some expected advantage—indicates strength of character. It is we who fret and repine and bewail our fate. There are conditions which are right in striving to change. It is always well to remain quiet under yoke and imposition. Our civil liberties would never have secured if our forefathers had submissively to tyranny and oppression even in resistance, it is the man who conquers most surely. The patient in his struggle and is not easily discouraged. True patience does not imply supine inaction. It may be combined with energy and activity; but it is never allied with morose, unavailing complaint, or the still more common fretfulness which wears out so many lives. There are things that are called "trials." Things do not run as our plans go awry, the hopes sustained are disappointed, our plans fail. Then is the time when we can bear the inevitable with unalterable and maintain a cheerful spirit under trial, our troubles do not sting and become a whole new discipline. There are some sicknesses which teach a lesson to all who are afflicted. There is one in New York which for many years a bright, cheerful creature has been lying helpless in gloom or impatience. At night the hours pass, bringing a burden of pain and weariness, yet the cheerful spirit never quails or resents the affliction. The strong and healthy, harried and worried by distractions, go into that room and are amazed by the spectacle they see there. Other homes there are where the scenes are of another order. The widow, toiling to support her feeble children; the drunkard's wife, bringing the daily shame and humiliation of her lot; the helpless, demanding no retort to the capricious shifting of an arbitrary employer; a hundred ways the lesson of patience is being taught and the example of patience is set. It is, however, especially in spiritual matters that the writer of the epistle is insistent on patience in the passage associated with the topic (James 5: 7-20). It is fitting to a people scattered and persecuted and oppressed, and he bids them be patient and not murmur, and he tells them that the farmer who has his seed waits in patience while it is sown by the early and latter rain for a long month the grain springs up and comes to the harvest and he bids them show like patience. He bids them show like patience, for their reward is sure. He bids them cheer themselves with the conviction that all wrongs would be righted, all evils removed, all wrongs redressed. We may build on the same basis. Nothing promotes patience so surely as faith in God. We know that our lives are in his hand, and nothing happens to us without his will, and that no burden will ever be laid upon which will be too heavy for us to bear with his help—this is to have a foundation on which patience can be based. "My grace is sufficient for thee," is an assurance which ought to give us courage in all trials. Like the child at school, in agreeable tasks, the benefit of which cannot understand, but conscious of the kind and wise father has directed him, the Christian may take all the ills patiently, in the firm faith, that they are part of the discipline which God sees necessary for his spiritual development. If our supreme desire is for that which means purity, peace and rest, we shall not be rebellious under the discipline of life, having the assurance that all things work together for good to those who love God.

HIS COMING.

OH, so often we are weary
'Mid the hurry, care, and strife,
And our souls are ever longing
For the higher, better life.
And in prayer and aspiration
Oft we lift our hearts and say,
I am waiting for your coming,
Blessed Jesus, night and day.
For thy glorious returning
With the angels fair and bright;
Oh, our hearts are ever yearning
When our faith will change to sight
Heaven's King and heaven's glory
Coming down to earth once more;
Oh, the sweetness of the story!
Let us read it o'er and o'er.
Like a bridegroom he is coming,
Rescued souls will be his bride;
Are our lamps all trimmed and burning,
That we may with him abide
In the many mansions holy.
Jeweled walls and streets of gold,
Gathered with the meek and lowly,
Safe forever in his fold?
No more going out forever,
No more sorrow, no more tears;
Death and pain can harm us never
Through the glad eternal years.
In the glory of his presence,
Which now lights the jasper sea,
We will meet the long-lost dear ones
Waiting there for you and me.

THE REAL.

(For The Christian Herald.)

WHAT is Life,
And what are the things that are real
In this strife?
It all seems
Like the visions that over me steal
In my dreams.
When I give
All my thoughts to this wonderful strife
That we live,
There are times
When I feel there is more of this life
Than these climes.
In the street
All is turmoil and care; and the face
That we greet
Is a mask.
And the real is unknown—not a trace
Of their task.
When I see
The fat cattle that graze in a nook
Or on lea,
And the birds
When they come down to drink at the brook
With the herds,
I then feel
That the books and the things that we read
Are not real.
But this world
Is the book where we read what we need,
All unfurled.

JOHN CECIL GRAY.

The Prophetic Programme.

The Place of the Present Time on the Prophetic Chart.

BY REV. JOHN JONES.*

STUDENTS of prophecy go to the Bible to find out from the general survey of the world's history from creation to restitution a reply to the two questions: Where do we stand at present in the Prophetic Chart? and is the course of events following the lines indicated in the Bible?

A reply to these questions is found in Daniel's prophecy of the seventy weeks of years (Daniel 9: 27). Sixty-nine of these weeks, constituting 483 years, were foretold to commence with the rebuilding of Jerusalem and to reach unto Messiah Prince—that is, unto the time of his appearance to Israel; and after the three score and two weeks, Messiah was to be cut off but not for himself. Then ensues a long gap or interval, which has not yet terminated; and the seventieth week still remains unfulfilled, and stands postponed until the latter end of this Gentile dispensation. It will eventually be fulfilled by the Prince that shall come (verse 24), some great powerful Prince making a sort of concession of Jerusalem and Judea to the Jews for a term of seven years; for "he shall confirm a covenant with many [of the Jews] for one week of years, and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation." He will undertake to be the friend and guardian of the Jews, to reinstate them in their own land; and they will recommence their morning and evening sacrifices and oblations in a rebuilt Jewish temple; but in the midst of the seven years he will break the covenant and institute a persecution of both Jews and Gentiles alike during the latter three and a half years, until finally "he comes to his end between the two seas upon the glorious holy mountain; and is broken without hand" (Daniel 11: 45; 8: 25).

Hence we now stand very near to the close of the intervening gap between Daniel's sixty-nine weeks of years, and the momentous seventieth week upon the brink of which we tread. And we are advancing onwards rapidly towards the ultimate crisis of this age, which is intimately connected with the restoration of the Jews, the general falling away or apostasy from the Christian faith, and the development of the personal Antichrist or man of sin (II. Thess. 2). I see the gathering forces of this crisis in the active propagandism of the three unclean demon spirits—namely, Antichristian infidelity and spiritualism, lawless democracy, and intriguing Jesuitical superstition, which are predicted to go forth at the present time to gather all people to the war of the great day of God Almighty (Rev. 16: 13). I discern the premonitory seething of its ingredients in the social agitation and internal heaving of the nations, in the tide of moral corruption setting in upon society, in the incurable heresies more and more infecting the various branches of the Church, in the increasing tendency to change, innovation, and unrest that is unsettling individuals, harassing communities, and disturbing entire lands. In the midst of this abnormal and menacing complication of affairs, our first and foremost duty is to expect, and to live in readiness for, the personal coming of Christ to translate to heaven his watching and waiting people, in order that they may escape the desolating judgments and calamities that are to signalize the era of Antichrist. The significant language of our Saviour's repeated injunctions to us to watch for his second advent incontestably implies that certain great privileges will be the reward of those who do watch, but will be forfeited by those who do not.

The warnings and exhortations to watch for the advent of Christ in order to escape the great tribulation, are rendered almost null and void if the unwatchful and unfaithful are to escape by translation, just as much as the watchful and the faithful; and, in fact, such an erroneous notion tends to encourage unbelief and neglect of vigilance in reference to the personal coming of Christ.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CONTEST ENDED.

Names of the Champions Announced and Prizes Awarded—Roll of Honor Prizes—Close of a Remarkable Competition.

AFTER a friendly contest extending over a period of several months, and involving correspondence from almost every part of the United States, our Sunday School championship competition has at last reached a conclusion. As was announced at the beginning of the competition, the 1st of June was fixed as the date after which no new entries would be received. Consequently, with the present issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the contest may be regarded as at an end. The conditions were these: That each competing Sunday School pupil should send full name and address, and also record of consecutive attendances at Sunday School up to February, 1897, such record to be certified by the Pastor, Superintendent, or Sunday School teacher. A single absence it was explained would vitiate a record; and the attendances must be continuous and uninterrupted.

Hundreds of letters were received and many remarkable records came to light which would otherwise have remained unknown. It is beyond question that the contest has resulted in creating a healthy spirit of emulation among Sunday Schools throughout the land, and that many hundreds of scholars will be inspired to greater zeal and fidelity in their attendance and studies by the example of the splendid records others have made.

In considering the claims of the numerous contestants, care has been taken to do justice to all. A small number of the entries have been disqualified by absences during the five years preceding February 1, 1897, but wherever a doubt has existed the pupil has received the benefit of it. This especially applies to the Honor list. In the Prize Competition for male scholars, the first prize has been awarded to Samuel Winterton, of the First Baptist Sunday School, Keyport, N. J., who has a record of thirty-three years and sixteen weeks, or 1732 consecutive attendances, vouched for by Mr. S. Gilhuly, teacher. The first prize for female scholars has been won by Mrs. Emma Corbett, of Biddle Memorial Mission Sunday School, Carlisle, Pa., with a record of twenty-four years, or 1,248 consecutive attendances, vouched for by Mr. Geo. Bridges, Superintendent. These fortunate competitors will each receive the following valuable prize:

ELEGANT LARGE ART BIBLE (London Edition) with nearly one thousand superb illustrations, bound in genuine seal-Divinity Circuit—kid lining, red under gold edges, with thumb index and appropriately inscribed; Value $25.00.

The second prize for male pupils has been awarded to George H. Glasgow, of Central Church Sunday School, Rochester, N. Y., with a record of thirty years or 1560 consecutive attendances, vouched for by Mr. John H. Elliot, Superintendent. The second prize for female scholars is won by Miss Martha Givler, of Grace U. B. Sunday School, Fairview, Pa., with a record of twenty-two years and four weeks or 1148 consecutive attendances, vouched for by H. W. Neidig, Secretary. These second prize winners will each receive the following:

ELEGANT LARGE ART BIBLE (general description same as the other Bible), bound in Divinity Circuit, Palestine Levant, Grained Leather Binding, Red Under Gold Edges, not indexed, and appropriately inscribed; Value $18.50.

Our Roll of Honor is a long one and is given here in full. It will doubtless find thousands of readers, as a very large number of scholars are personally interested in this branch of the competition. Every scholar on the list, which appears in the next column, having qualified in accordance with the terms of the competition, and a clear record of not less than five years or 260 attendances, will be presented with a superb, illustrated New Testament, beautifully bound in Divinity Circuit, with red under gold edges. The Honor Roll is as follows:

New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.—Free to all Readers.

All readers will be glad to know that the new botanical discovery, Alkavis, has proved an assured cure for all diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or by disordered action of the kidneys or urinary organs. It is a wonderful discovery, with a record of 1200 hospital cures in 30 days. It acts directly upon the blood and kidneys, and is a true specific, just as quinine is in malaria. Rev. W. B. Moore, D.D., of Washington, testifies in the New York Christian Herald that Alkavis completely cured him of kidney and bladder disease of many years' standing. Many ladies also testify to its curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. So far the Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 418 Fourth Avenue, New York, are the only importers of this new remedy, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any form of kidney or bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the kidneys or urinary organs. We advise all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative powers.

This competition has also brought us many letters from superintendents who have sent their records, not wishing, however, to enter the list in rivalry to the Sunday School pupils. The most remarkable of these records is that of Mr. Chas. Phister, Superintendent of the M. E. Sunday School of Maysville, Ky. Mr. Phister is seventy-eight years old, and has attended Sabbath School as scholar, teacher or superintendent for the past seventy years, without a single absence.

Home Talks with Mothers and Daughters.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

REDOM FOR MOTHERS.

DAUGHTERS do not mean to be so, but they really are very provoking at times, at least some of them are. They seem very often to forget that mothers like to have their own way in the house to dress as they please, go where they choose, and in a general way to live their own lives. There are, in fact, two types of daughters—one is the type who seems to get beyond childhood, who, far from asserting herself, looks to her mother to the end of the line. I have known women forty years old did not appear able to buy a hat for themselves without their mother's advice, and I remember a set of girls whose ages were between forty and fifty, and who presumed to make the tea or position of a chair, or do any large thing in the house without consulting their queenly old mother, who ruled the house with a rod of iron.

The other type is the opposite of another type of girls who behave in a very different way, and who most lovingly, but at the same time most tormentingly take upon themselves to order all things in life for their mothers. The mother wishes to go to the theatre, but the daughter thinks it is too late, or that mother would not go till to-morrow. The mother has a certain color; the daughter has a different color very unbecoming and she goes to go with her mother's hair and the poor old lady is so upset by the suggestions that she finds no comfort in her life.

There is no doubt, are apt to make mistakes, once in awhile even the most prudent mother may assume an attitude which her daughter resents. There are also those whom their children never seem to think that sons and daughters who are really men and women still under nursery guidance. There are also other mothers who are simply tyrants to their strong-willed children. They take on a note of patronage and an air toward this gentle, self-sacrificing mother. Her little fads are her amusement; her amiable weakness is tolerated but are not treated with respect; and the young people trample on mother's most cherished wishes and her gentleness which is very hateful to the eyes of the observer who knows that the mother is hurt and grieved, though she is loyal to say so. She, indeed, stands for her children, and has a right to be so, but for their sins of omission and commission, an excuse her friends will not accept.

We should remember that we can have no other in this world, and that this gone out of it the most unselfish, most compassionate, the most beautiful love which is refused to a human being will be a blessing to us. Remembering how it bore us in pain, cradled us in its arms, took care of us in the feeblest of childhood, toiled and saved for us day by day, surely we cannot be so ungenerous, and too self-forgetting in our treatment of her.

There are people who are capable of occasional and heroic acts of self-denial and sacrifice in the daily intercourse of life, to be thoughtful about the little things which make or mar happiness. It is a mother's duty to find her children's shielding her from discomfort and pain, and she prizes the shield more if it be tactful and if it be based on that it prevents her from doing things which she desires. Make things smooth and easy in the little things, make it possible for her to carry out her plans, help her in every way you can; and be assured that you will never regret on any day of your life when you have accorded and the mother has shown to your mother.

Where there comes to the mother grown old, the necessity of leaving her own home and becoming a member of another family, making her home, as the phrase is, with John or with Mary, there needs to be the greatest care that she shall miss nothing of the old comfort, and that so far as possible, she shall have the independence of movement which she had while under her own roof. It is always a wrench for a mother, however old or feeble, to give up the management of her own home. It is the more so if she must leave that home and become only one, and a subordinate one, in the household of a daughter-in-law or a son-in-law. In these circumstances let hers be the pleasantest room in the house, let the grandchildren delight in ministries of comfort, let her have the flowers and the books she loves, and let her go about and take up little household tasks as she may choose. If it is her pleasure to potter about in the garden, by all means show her that you love to see her there among the flowers, and if she have a faculty (as no doubt she has) for making pastry and bread and various delicacies in the kitchen, do not prevent her.

Somewhere I read a pathetic story not long ago of an old mother whose children were so determined that she should never do a single thing, but she should simply sit with folded hands in her best gown while they waited on her, that their very attentions made her desperately unhappy. Once they were suddenly called away and obliged to leave home at so short a notice that they could get no one to come and take their place in waiting on the mother. She could hardly restrain her excitement and impatience until they were out of sight, and no sooner had the railroad whistle assured her that they were safe on the train than she hastened to the kitchen as fast as her feet could carry her, made a great fire, and for hours together baked everything she could think of! She staid up all night, and was worn out but perfectly delighted.

I knew an old lady who, at seventy, one day was seen hanging out a large washing in the garden. The neighbors were very much shocked, as they knew that she was considered far too feeble to engage in any work, and especially in work so hard as this. But it transpired that in a family emergency her active daughter had been called in another direction and mother had at once rushed to take a hand in the work she had formerly enjoyed.

CHAPTER XIV.
Jessie's Hard Lesson.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

FOR three years there were only such changes in the Lloyd and McAslin families as would naturally flow from the tide of events which had thrown their destinies together. Mrs. Lloyd and Alice remained abroad, wandering at their leisure, from one famous city to another, and doing good in many small, unobserved ways, only known to themselves, and the recipients of their benevolence. For Mrs. Lloyd was no longer solely occupied with her own soul and her own salvation; she had discovered that they who wish to go to heaven alone are not likely to get there. Solitary prayer and meditation on her own spiritual condition, though not abandoned, were subordinated to that active faith in God which proves itself by continual help to man. She had taken into her heart as the ideal Christian life, that little saying of St. Peter's about Jesus of Nazareth—"a man approved of God, who went about doing good."

Alice was her cheerful and ready helper. Her great delight was in the musical facilities offered in European cities, and these very facilities were frequent opportunities for the wisest charity. Through them she was brought naturally into contact with refined and educated people, suffering the straits and pangs of unconfessed poverty—young women, mostly of her own land, struggling bravely against unconsidered necessities—deluded with false hopes—despairing for some slight encouragement—home sick, poor and friendless, and many of such cases found help and hope from Alice Lloyd.

The chagrin and disappointment resulting from her relationship with Lord Medway, had slipped from her mind like a disagreeable dream, and the slow, sweet hours passed in gaining knowledge and in doing good, brought her only that content which is another name for happiness. The one thorn in her heart was her treatment of John McAslin. The wound others had given her was healed; the wound she had given herself still pained her. She felt that she had been unjust to John. She had thrown upon him a faithlessness she alone was to blame for. She had ignored rights John might reasonably have claimed, and then been angry with him for the manly reserve that made him choose to bear his suffering alone. She still loved—for a first true love is not easily slain—but she did not hope. She was sure John had forgotten her, and she never spoke of him, for the feeling that comes with the revelation that all is over, is gathered silently into the heart.

Sometimes there came a letter to Mrs. Lloyd from John, but it was solely on business. He was now Steve's lawyer, and the manager of all his immense property, and occasionally circumstances came up in which it was necessary to consult Mrs. Lloyd, or to obtain her co-operation. These letters had the clear, straightforward tone of John's nature and methods, but they never exceeded the legitimate courtesy of the position. Every one of them gave Alice pain. For a day or two after the receipt of any missive from John, she abandoned her heart to vain longing and regrets, and to despair hard to control and vanquish. One day while thus suffering she suddenly became very homesick.

"Mother," she said, "I want to go back to America. We have been a long time away."

"Then we will go back, Alice. I, too, shall be glad to return. The wish has been lying in my heart for a long time. I will write to Steve this morning and see if he can come and help us. We have gathered so many treasures, and these it will be necessary to pack properly. Then there are the Custom House liabilities and formalities which I do not understand, and would not dare to face."

"Do you think Steve will come?"

"I am sure he will come if he is able."

"Jessie may stand in the way."

"Not of Steve's duty. And I think Steve will consider our comfort his duty."

So the letter was written, and it reached Steve one morning as he was eating his

Have You Asthma or Hay Fever?

Medical Science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma and Hay-fever in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. I. Combs, of Martinsburg, West Va. writes that it cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing, and Hon. L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that for three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair in Hay-fever season, being unable to lie down night or day. The Kola Plant cured him at once. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmer's Magazine, was also cured when he could not lie down for fear of choking, being always worse in Hay-fever season. Others of our readers give similar testimony, proving it truly a wonderful remedy. If you suffer from Asthma or Hay-fever, write to me to send your address to the Kola Importing Co., 111 Broadway, New York, who will prove its power with a Large Case by mail free to every sufferer of The Christian Herald, who sends it. All the yask in the world is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. It costs you nothing and you should surely try it.

What Christian Missionaries have Accomplished in the Shah's Empire in Sixty Years—
Joseph Writes of the Religious and Social Life of the Moslems and Nestorians.

X the letter printed below, from the pen of Hannah G. Yoseph. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S medical missionary representative in Persia, a new and interesting light is shed upon the moral and social aspect of affairs in the kingdom of the Shah. She writes as a careful and judicious observer of the progress her native land is making toward religious enfranchisement. It is a slow process this, of transforming a heathen despotism into an enlightened one, but the progress already made under the influence of consecrated missionary effort encourages the hope that splendid triumphs await the faithful workers for Christ who labor in this most interesting portion of the great Asiatic field:

OROOMIAH, PERSIA, May 3.

54. MOTHER AND CHILD.

In order to have your readers understand the present status of mission work in Persia. I will ask them to look back sixty years to a time when there were no missionaries among the Nestorians. There was only one woman who could read and write; there were no schools; each clergyman and bishop trained and taught his own successor, who was almost always a relative of his own. Service was conducted in the ancient Syriac tongue which was only understood by the clergy and sometimes even they could not translate it. People were seldom buried in a tongue which they did not know. As a nation, they had, and had no part or voice in government, except in paying heavy taxes. During the reign of their landlords forced them to work in the rice and wheat fields without pay. Nestorians did not dare to use the same cloth for garments that Mohammedans used, for fear of the Mohammedans. Christians used even to wear their new clothes in secret. People were robbed at their own door-step and would not dare to rebuke their robbers glad to escape with their lives. A Moslem would say to a Christian:

Turkish, Armenian, English, and a dialect of Hebrew are read and spoken. What a school for a student of languages! And it is only a sample of many other villages. Zenana work is yet exceedingly limited and dangerous to the workers and attend-

Zenana work is yet exceedingly limited and dangerous to the workers and attendants. Still, there are skilled workers who are watching for every opportunity and are sowing the Gospel seed. Most of the Mohammedans, especially the women, love to hear the story of the Cross. They find it wonderfully fascinating. At these meetings they throw aside their veils, no men being present. They sit on the floor and the "missionary woman" reads "the old, old story." If you watch you may see some crying and some slapping their chests and their faces, as a sign of sorrow, sympathy and wonder at the divine love and its power to heal the sick and to forgive sins. One woman in a corner whispers to one in front of her: "Is it true that Issa (Jesus) died for men and he was so good?" And her friend shakes her head and lifts her hands and face towards heaven and says, "Wallah. I do not know, but that book says so." Christ's teaching that "whosoever shall smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also," to them is a stumbling-block, for they have shed the blood of the witnesses of Jesus for more than 1200 years. It seems hard to understand it. Still there are those among them who seem thirsty and hungry for real love and the love of Christ and his suffering fascinates them, and compels them to seek light in secret, like Nicodemus of old. And others come for fishes and loaves and are caught in the net. Today, if there was religious freedom in Persia there would

The trials and difficulties of a Moslem who becomes a Christian are severe. He is an outcast from society: his personal property, his wife, and his children are taken away from him: even his life are not safe and any moment he may loose it. Killing an apostate and confiscating his property is even yet considered a great privilege. A few years ago, when Aga Yan was killed, Mohammedans fought

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

James T., Reading, Pa. Is not New York the greatest city on earth, in point of population?

No. London has about 4,250,000, New York now about 3,200,000, and Paris has probably a million less than New York.

A. G. M., Cornwallis, U. S., referring to the inquiry as to the name of David's mother, writes:

See 1. Chronicles, 2nd chapter, 13th to 17th verse; read Jesse's offspring; then see 11. Samuel 17th chapter, 25th verse. Therein you will find David's mother's (Nahash) name coupled with the sisters of David.

This inference, however, is not quite conclusive, for these reasons: 1. The rabbinical tradition is that Nahash and Jesse were identical and the Talmud so declares. 2. Dean Stanley's History of the Jewish Church (vol. 2, p. 50), states that Nahash was the King of Ammon, and that his wife was afterward the wife of Jesse. The name might be borne by either sex. The whole question as to the real name of David's mother is therefore, in the opinion of the ablest commentators, still in doubt.

Mr. J. P. Waterbury, Mass. 1. What was the estimated number of victims who were killed by Turks and Kurds in Armenia? 2. How much does it cost to train, teach, and support an Armenian child in the care of the missionaries?

1. Dr. Grace Kimball, who conducted THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's relief work at Van and who is now the resident physician of Vassar College, estimates that 50,000 adults, men and women, perished in the massacres, and that they left 100,000 orphans. 2. About $25 to $30 yearly; probably slightly less in some places.

C. A. C., What is the origin of the saying: "Robbing Peter to pay Paul?"

It is a saying which had its origin in an event occurring over three centuries ago, when, in 1540, the Abbey Church of St. Peter, Westminster, England, was advanced to the dignity of a Cathedral, and ten years afterward it was joined to the diocese of London and its estates appropriated to the repair of St. Paul's Cathedral.

F. B., Dalton, City, Ill. Is it right for a Board of Trustees to prohibit entertainments or concerts to be given in a church by home talent when the same wish to charge a door fee?

The Trustees have discretion in all such matters, and it rests with them to decide whether the proposed entertainment is a proper one. There are many reasonable objections to church entertainments which you will find fully discussed in a little book on the subject published by A. W. Hall, Syracuse, N. Y. It is not to be supposed that the Trustees would decide capriciously and without due consideration.

Reader, Verona, Mo. Who is the "he" mentioned in Acts 7: 38?

Stephen referred to Moses. If you look at the preceding verse, you will see that he uses the same form of expression, merely substituting the pronoun for the name.

S. S. S., Ohio. When, where, and by whom was Paul put to death?

This question has already been repeatedly answered. Dionysius of Corinth (A. D. 170), says that Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom in Italy together. Eusebius repeats a tradition that Paul was beheaded at Rome in Nero's reign. Clements Romanus, Tertullian, Caus and others adopt the same tradition substantially.

F. Hepburns. What are the seven wonders of the world?

The Colossus of Rhodes, Pyramids, Temple of Diana at Ephesus, Hanging Gardens of Babylon, Statue of Jupiter Olympus, Mausoleum of Artemisia, and Pharos of Alexandria.

Reader, Ripon, W. Va. How can a person overcome bashfulness, caused mostly by thinking he is the object of universal attention?

Cultivate the society of persons of your own age and try to have a share in their conversation. A good plan is to join a debating club and become an active speaking member. Theories won't overcome bashfulness, but persistent effort on these lines will greatly aid you in doing so.

"A Minister," Md., writes this on a most interesting question:

I would like to ask a question concerning the Scripture reference used in answering question

No 2, by "One in Sorrow." The question was: "Do our loved ones who are saved really know and see us here? Are they sent to earth on errands of mercy and love?" The reference Heb. 12: 1 seems to teach that the saints in glory are witnesses of the race of Christians for the goal. But is Heb. 12: 1 a good answer to the question, "Are our loved ones sent to earth on errands of mercy and love?" It reads: "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?" The verse above this indicates that "they" refers to the angels and not to the saved of mankind. Our saved ones do not become angels, for they are an order of God's heavenly creation. Christ is said to take on him "not the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham."

Rev. R. Ashley Cate, the Life-Saving Station Evangelist of Port Republic, N. J., writes to thank many of our readers for the kind interest they have taken in his work and for contributing toward its support.

Miss L. B., Austintown, O. In a choir of eight, where three or four are unable to read music, and in fact do not know when they make a discord, is it our duty to permit the whole choir to sing at funerals or special services, when we all share the discords, simply because it wounds some of their feelings when only four sing?

No. Let them take the same trouble and pains to learn correctly the music they are to sing as they would take in any other matter on a single meal by himself alone, and Horace tells us that he had 5,000 rich purple robes in his house. There are many stories regarding his vanity and indulgence of appetite, some of them probably untrue.

Anne B. R., Madison, Ind. Will you please state in THE MAIL-BAG how much money has been sent to India through your paper?

$100,000 to date, for distribution by some seventy missionaries at over fifty relief stations.

Mary W., Lancaster, Pa. I am greatly interested in your Sunday School missionary work among the children in the West and also in your beautiful Christ-like work at the Home in Mont-Lawn which I see you are preparing to open for another summer. To whom shall I send contributions for these two causes?

TO THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York. All contributions for the causes named will be acknowledged in the paper.

L. C. E., Nyack, N. Y. What did Paul mean by speaking (1. Timothy 1: 20) of delivering certain people to Satan?

It appears that the Apostles possessed some mysterious power, unknown to us, of disciplining unworthy members of the church. There is a still more circumstantial reference to this power in 1. Cor. 5: 5. It appears to have included, in addition to excommunication, some form of physical suffering which it was hoped would operate as a discipline to bring them to repentance. This suffering the Apostle attributes to Satan, as he did his own affliction of the thorn in the flesh which he says (11. Cor. 12: 7) was a messenger from Satan to buffet him.

Believer, Des Moines, Ia. When you speak of no man being able to lead an absolutely sinless life, do you base your belief on the opinion that God is not able to keep from sin those who trust in him?

No that is not our opinion and you must not charge us with holding it. God is able to do many things that he will not do. He is able to keep men from sin, but it is not his

Scripture, both in the Old and New Testament, to worship the Lord in his (See Heb. 10: 25; Deut. 4: 10; Acts and many other passages.) 4. The ordinances and obligations which it is duty of everyone confessing Christ to undertake. Neglect of such ord on the part of one who has the opportunity publicly confess Christ and declare ment to his church on earth is inex (See Matt. 28: 19, 20; Acts 2: 38 and etc.; also, Rom. 10: 9, 10; John 7: 13 10: 33.)

Mrs. E. R., Dayton, O. Is it anywhere in the Bible that the soldier who struck Jesus with the scourge was the Saviour hung on the Cross?

The name is preserved traditionally in the Bible, and it is added that the soldier who struck Jesus with the scourge was the Saviour hung on the Cross.

S. S. Teacher, Brooklyn, N. Y. What had Paul for claiming to be a Roman citizen? Some places he claims that he was a Jew, some that he was a Pharisee.

His claim was perfectly valid and inherited from his father. (See Acts 22: 28) Jew or a man of any other nationality acquire Roman citizenship by some acquired service or in some cases by birth, as in the passage already quoted. The plenty of men now who could answer inquiry as to themselves that they are citizens, yet as to race are Jews. Roman citizenship was highly valued and it was very useful in protecting a man from what it was in Paul's case.

Student, Adrian, Mich. Was the belief in the immortality of the soul common among ancient Jews?

We do not find it directly and stated, but some passages would be in itself without such a belief. We say, in reading them, that the man who had believed that death was the end of all. Saul appears to have believed that. Samuel still lived when he appeared to the witch of Endor. (1. Samuel 28: 7) The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews says (11: 16), that the patriarchs desired a heavenly country, and the Psalms and the prophets there are many passages which show that the belief was prevalent.

Subscriber, Scranton, Pa. Who is referred to in Rev. 17: 1, 3, 5?

Protestant Expositors believe that the Church of Rome is referred to. The reference to the seven hills (17: 9), is quoted in confirmation of this, often called "the City of the Seven Hills." The reference to her being drunk with the wine of the wrath of God is also quoted in confirmation of this. The reference to the persecution of the Church in England, France, and elsewhere, is also quoted in confirmation of this. The allusion to her being a whore, supposed to refer to her alliance with worldly sovereigns, especially the last Antichristian potentate who she will be in league until he is overthrown, is also quoted in confirmation of this. The other ten kings whose power will be cast off, are also quoted in confirmation of this. (See Rev. 17: 16.)

Sufferer, Aurora, Ill. I am much troubled by the refusal of an Episcopal minister to officiate at my marriage. I am a divorced woman, but my former husband is still living. I am sure that my husband is a guilty party as was proved at his trial, but that did not remove his guilt. Do you consider I was wrong in consulting another minister to marry us?

No, we believe that the injured party in such a case is justified in consulting another minister. The misconduct of the other minister, in our opinion, dissolves the marriage. The reference to the man who was of the kind mentioned by Matthew (5: 32) It would be an injustice if a husband or wife were to be married from a new marriage by the misconduct of another. That would be making the innocent suffer for the guilty.

Inquirer, Jersey City, N. J. Why did not the writers of the Bible write in conformity with the rules of grammar? The use of "who" is especially surprising and I retained in the Revised Version.

It was hoped that the Revised Version would have corrected the old fashioned style of the Bible. The Revisers had been instructed to follow the style of language in the Authorized Version and did not feel at liberty to change. The American Committee recommended that it be made. If you have a list of suggestions at the close of the New Testament you will see that seven refers to this change. The conservative objection to making any change was not absolutely necessary as it was in this case unwisely as it appears to be.

DRYING COFFEE ON A PLANTATION AT CORDOVA, MEXICO.

Cordova is a small town of the sister republic, with a population of less than 10,000, and is about fifty-seven miles inland from Vera Cruz. Its coffee lands are among the finest in the country. The neighborhood abounds in antiquarian remains, and some beautiful specimens of ancient carving and pottery have been unearthed there.

of importance. What is worth doing for the Lord is worth doing well, and those of the choir who cannot sing correctly, should be respectfully requested to vacate their seats until they learn to read music correctly, which is an easy matter with a proper instructor.

L. S., Owego, N. Y. Who is the present Emperor of China, and when was he born?

Tsai-Tien, the ruler of 386,000,000 souls, was born in 1871, succeeded to the throne 1875, and assumed control of the government in 1889.

Sister Sarah, Thayer, Kan. 1. My husband holds a position in life which throws me more or less in society. I have a poor command of language, and cannot carry on a conversation intelligently with anyone. Often I cannot think of anything to say, and am so nervous that I sometimes fail to express my opinions for want of proper words, when I do think of something to say. My husband is a public speaker. 2. Should a preacher's wife shake hands every time she meets a friend, if he is as often as every day?

1. Store your mind with information by a course of reading, and then, together with some friend with whom you are at ease, talk of some of the subjects of which you have read. Follow this course patiently and persistently, varying the topics, and soon you will be able to express yourself clearly. To acquire the art of a skilled conversationalist one must give years of effort. It comes as a gift to only a few. 2. No; it is not at all necessary, and would be deemed effusive and in very bad taste.

Jesse P., Paterson, N. J. Who was Lucullus and what was his history? I read of him lately, but cannot find anything about him.

He was a rich Roman soldier (B. C. 110-57) who became noted as a gourmand and glutton. It is said he expended as much as $8,000 habit to treat them as automatons. He could save the whole world by any act of his will, but he takes the slower, but more noble course of drawing men to himself. He would have men choose him and seek him. As in the Parable of the Prodigal Son, the father might have locked his son up and prevented him from going to the far country; but he would not do so with his son. The son might go if he wished and when he wished to return he was welcomed back, but no compulsion was used. God deals so with men. He will not by an act of his power relieve his children of the necessity of watchfulness and resistance to temptation, making them as it were sin-proof. They must watch and pray, and he will help them to resist. The question of men leading a sinless life, is one of fact not of their ability to do so.

Reader, Greensburg, Pa. 1. Must not a person who wishes to be a Christian study the Bible rather than read it? 2. In Exodus it says that if you do certain things you will go to hell, and not in any place in that book does it say anything of forgiveness. The New Testament teaches of such forgiveness. Would you call that a contradiction? 3. Can a person go to heaven if he does not belong to a church? 4. What is the fate of a person when he dies, who was never baptized or confirmed?

1. Mere perfunctory reading will not be helpful. The Scriptures should be studied or "searched" carefully and prayerfully. There are now so many aids to Bible study that the work is made much more simple than it was a generation ago. 2. No, it is not to be taken as a contradiction. The Mosaic dispensation was under the law; that of Christ is under grace. 3. Undoubtedly he can; but that is not to be made an excuse for ignoring or neglecting the ordinances of religion. CUBA'S HOPE UNDIMMED.

The little island still Struggling for Liberty — Our Government may Call Spain to Account on the Ruiz Case.

ALTHOUGH, during the last few months, the announcement has repeatedly come from Spanish official sources that the "insurrection" in Cuba had been effectually suppressed and the actual facts disclose a different state of affairs. Since the death of Meco, the young patriot leader of the Cuban cause has not been mentioned.

Commander of the Cuban forces, has been more active than ever, and despite his many campaigns, seems as vigorous as any of the younger men to command under him. He is a skillful leader, and in view of the overwhelming numerical superiority of his forces, he has conducted a remarkable campaign. His bands have pressed almost to the very gates of Havana, and have carried terror into those cities where Gen. Weyler's troops were expected to be strongly posted. After defeat has been inflicted on the Spanish columns, although no important battle has been fought in many months. The warfare is altogether of the guerrilla order, the strength of Weyler's making this course necessary on the part of the insurgents. Almost every Cuban mail brings to this country some new and startling story of outrage inflicted upon the helpless Cuban by the Spanish troops. The name of military law, which, as unarmed non-combatants are designated, are driven from their homes and across country to territory sought by Gen. Weyler, under the pretence of keeping them out of harm's way and prevent them from aiding the Cubans, they are held as prisoners and subjected to the most degrading indignities. Any attempt to resist this outrageous programme is punished with imprisonment, and many hundreds of cases are cited as attesting the thoroughness and cruelty of Weyler's wholesale deportation of the miserable creatures, who at Havana on summary trial process continue, and any well-known and influential persons have been placed in prison on the charge of being traitors or of actively sympathizing with the Cubans. Several prominent individuals are now incarcerated on these charges, and the probability that all will be sentenced to death, after a farcical trial, is a matter of course. It is intimated that Spain will require the United States Government to trace a number of active Cuban sympathizers who are now in this country, and, it is said, for Cuban freedom, that policy will be pursued by the United States in such a contingency. It is believed that the United States will aid in precipitating a crisis in Cuban affairs, and that a firm refusal to deliver these men to death would be the answer. In the matter of Dr. Ruiz, the American whose life was sacrificed by Weyler, our State Department has made an investigation and procured reports on the subject—one by

Consul-General Lee and the other by the Spanish Consul at Philadelphia. It is highly probable that our government will make this a test case, and insist upon apology and reparation by Spain for the Ruiz affair. Firm action will assuredly be taken; for the purpose of upholding the honor of the flag; at the same time nothing will be done that can be construed as an attempt to unduly coerce a power now involved in many difficulties. Concerning the probable confidence of the administration on Cuban affairs generally, a well-informed journal says: Whether there will be a display of naval force or a demand for an ultimatum is in doubt. The government would lean toward moral rather than other forces. But the demand will be made and the answer must be satisfactory. The question does not involve a mere individual wrong, but the honor of the country and the inviolability of the flag. The President believes the solution of the Cuban question will be found in granting to Cuba the rights granted to Canada and the Cape Colonies by Great Britain.

Suggestions for the Christian Endeavor Topic for July 4. Deut. 32: 1-18.

WHY should we study the historical books of the Old Testament? The question is often asked and with apparent reason. Seeing that the Hebrews are no longer a nation, but as a race are parts of many nations, their early history does not offer the attractions that are offered by the history of nations which are now exercising a potent influence over the world. But it has a merit of its own, unique and attractive to the devout mind. The historians of the Hebrew people were men who saw God in all the national events. The prosperity or adversity such interesting and profitable reading. But can there be any parallel between nineteenth century life in the United States and the life of a nation whose besetting sin was a lapse into idolatry? We are never tempted to worship Baal, Moloch, or Astarte. We do not multiply our Gods. The trouble with us is not in breaking the command: "Thou shalt have no other Gods beside me," but rather in having no God at all. Yet our hands are not clean as to idolatry. There are scenes witnessed in the saloons of our great cities that are very much like the worship of Bacchus; in our exchanges, like the worship of Mammon, and in our licentious resorts, like the worship of Venus. To us the old prophets speak as they did to their contemporaries. They warn us that the nation that does these things will have to suffer. God has not changed his nature, nor has he granted to us the immunity he would not grant to the chosen people. The foundations of our nation were laid by men who held the same belief. The Pilgrim Fathers were men steeped in Old Testament lore. They believed that God governed the world in their day as he governed it in the days of Manasseh and Hezekiah. Later generations have put God farther away. Yet there has been enough in our history to prove to us that God still guides the world. If that doctrine is offensive to modern ears we may put it in another form: There is, then, an eternal law that national unrighteousness works its own retribution. The Christian part of the nation in many States held aloof from politics for so long, that the control of the Government fell into the hands of the most unscrupulous element, and things have been done that have made us blush for our land. We have seen our legislators and public men grow rich on bribes and the tribute of vice. We have seen dishonest and unprincipled men in high office, and have learned how heavy is the penalty we have had to pay for our neglect of duty. In many ways we have been punished because we kept silence and allowed evil deeds to be done without daring to protest. If the Christian men of every State insisted on righteous government, if they refused to yield to the party lash and made it known that they would not vote for immoral men, such men would not be nominated. With a very little trouble, there might be organized a religious voice which would be as potent and would command as much respect as the saloon element now does. This trouble we ought to take, and if we are too lazy, or too indifferent, we need not be surprised if there is scandal in our legislative halls and corruption in our executive offices. Our country is worth saving and it can be saved only by good men standing together and insisting that God's will shall be done and God's law shall be the law of our land. True patriotism requires at least this much from every Christian citizen. Our fathers fought and bled to win our freedom; we ought at least to do our part to keep our land from falling under the power of the devil.

aim. The President will maintain that in the interest of humanity, of the peace and honor of Spain, and of the rights of Americans, so long in peril of war, devastation and rapine, Spain should in some form, by American mediation or otherwise, end a business which, however we view it, casts a ghastly shadow over the closing century. Late news from Cuba is that the recent operations have been favorable to the insurgents, whose bands are swarming in the Santa Clara province and around Havana itself. Several days ago another large filibustering expedition was safely landed, in the face of a hot fire from a Spanish gunboat. There is much suffering and privation everywhere on the island as a result of the protracted war and the which by turns came upon Israel were not, in the opinion of these writers, due to the tariff or the currency, or unwise legislation, or to any of the causes to which we look when we try to account for national vicissitudes. They believed that the nation prospered when it revered and served God, and when adversity came upon the nation, they attributed it to the fact that the nation had forsaken God and had turned to idolatry. Probably there were men at that time who could account in other ways for all these calamities, and the Bible writers would know of the fact, but they disdained to notice these minor causes and went straight to the original Cause. It is this which makes their works

VICTORIA'S JUBILEE.

on the Text: Esther 5: 3. What wilt thou, Queen Esther?

HIS question, which was asked of a queen thousands of years ago, all civilized nations are this day asking of Queen Victoria. "What wilt thou have of honor, of reward, or reverence, or service, of national and international acclamation? What wilt thou, the Queen of the nineteenth century?" The seven miles of procession through the streets of London day after to-morrow will be a small part of the congratulatory procession whose multitudinous tramp will encircle the earth. The celebrative anthems that will sound up from Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's Cathedral in London will be less than the vibration of one harp-string as compared with the doxologies which this hour roll up from all nations in praise to God for the beautiful life and the glorious reign of this oldest Queen amid many centuries. From five o'clock of the morning of 1837, when the Archbishop of Canterbury addressed the embarrassed and weeping and almost affrighted girl of eighteen years with the startling words, "Your Majesty," until this sixtieth anniversary of her enthronement, the prayer of all good people on all sides of the seas, whether that prayer be offered by the three hundred millions of her subjects or the larger number of millions who are not her subjects, whether that prayer be solemnized in church, or rolled from great orchestras, or poured forth by military bands from forts and battlements and in front of triumphant armies all around the world, has been and is now, "God save the Queen!" Amid the innumerable columns that have been printed in eulogy of this Queen at the approaching anniversary,—columns which, put together, would be literally miles long,—it seems to me that the chief cause of congratulation to her and of praise to God has not yet been properly emphasized, and in many cases the chief key-note has not been struck at all. We have been told over and over again what has occurred in the Victorian era. The mightiest thing she has done has been almost ignored, while she has been honored by having her name attached to individuals and events for whom and for which she had no responsibility. We have put before us the names of potent and grandly useful men and women who have lived during her reign, but I do not suppose that she at all helped Thomas Carlyle in twisting his involved and mighty satires, or helped Disraeli in issuance of his epigrammatic wit, or helped Cardinal Newman in his crossing over from religion to religion, or helped to inspire the enchanted sentiments of George Eliot and Harriet Martineau and Mrs. Browning, or helped to invent any of George Cruikshank's beautiful cartoons, or helped George Grey in founding a British South African Empire, or kindled the patriotic fervor with which John Bright stirred the masses, or had anything to do with the invention of the telephone or photograph, or the building up of the science of bacteriology, or the directing of the Roentgen rays which have revolutionized surgery, or helped in the inventions for facilitating printing and railroading and ocean voyaging. One is not to be credited or discredited for the virtue or the vice, the brilliance or the stupidity, of his or her contemporaries. While Queen Victoria has been the friend of all art, all literature, all science, all invention, all reform, her reign will be most remembered for all time and all eternity as the reign of Christianity. Beginning with that scene at five o'clock in the morning, in Kensington Palace, where she asked the Archbishop of Canterbury to pray for her and they knelt down, imploring Divine guidance, until this hour, not only in the sublime Liturgy of her Established Church but on all occasions, she has directly or indirectly declared, "I believe in God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ, his only begotten Son." I declare it, fearless of contradiction, that the mightiest champion of Christianity to-day is the throne of England. The Queen's book, so much criticized at the time of its appearance, some saying it was not skilfully done, and some saying that the private affairs of a household ought not so to have been exposed, was nevertheless a book of vast usefulness from the fact that it showed that God was acknowledged in all her life and that "Rock of Ages" was not an unusual song in Windsor Castle. Was there ever an explosion of fire-damp in the mines of Sheffield or Wales and her telegram was not the first to arrive with help and Christian sympathy? Is President Garfield dying at Long Branch, and is not the cable under the sea, reaching to Balmoral Castle, kept busy in announcing the symptoms of the sufferer?

I believe that no throne since the throne of David and the throne of Hezekiah and the throne of Esther has been in such constant touch with the throne of heaven as the throne of Victoria. From what I know of her habits, she reads the Bible more than she does Shakespeare. She admires the hymns of Horatio Bonar more than she does Byron's "Corsair." She has not knowingly admitted into her presence a corrupt man or dissolute woman. All the coming centuries of time cannot revoke the advantages of having had sixty years of Christian womanhood enthroned in the palaces of England. Compare her court surroundings with what were the court surroundings in the time of Henry VIII., or what were the court surroundings in the time of Napoleon, in the times of Louis XVI., in the times of men and women whose names may not be mentioned in decent society. Alas! for the revelries, and the more than Herodian dances, and scenes from which the veil must not be lifted. You need, however, in order to appreciate the purity and virtuous splendor of Victoria's reign to contrast it somewhat with the gehennas and the pandemoniums of many of the throne rooms of the past, and some of the throne rooms of the present. I call the roll of the queens of the earth, not that I would have them come up or come back, but that I may make them the background of a picture in which I can better present the present septenarian, so soon to be an octogenarian, now on the throne of England, her example so thoroughly on the right side that all the scandal-mongers in all the nations in six decades have not been able to manufacture an evil suspicion in regard to her that could be made to stick: Maria of Portugal, Isabella and Eleanor and Joanna of Spain, Catharine of Russia, Mary of Scotland, Maria Teresa of Germany, Marie Antoinette of France, and all the queens of England, as Mrs. Strickland has put them before us in her charming twelve volumes; and while some queen may surpass our modern queen in learning, and another in attractiveness of feature, and another in gracefulness of form, and another in romance of history, Victoria surpasses them all in nobility and grandeur and thoroughness of Christian character. I hail her! the Christian daughter, the Christian wife, the Christian mother, the Christian Queen! and let the Church of God and all benign and gracious institutions the world over cry out, as they come with music and bannered host, and million voiced huzzas, and the benedictions of earth and heaven, "What wilt thou, Queen Esther?"

Another thing I call to your attention in this illustrious woman's career, is that she is a specimen of high life uncorrupted. Would she have lived to celebrate the sixtieth anniversary of her coronation and the seventy-eighth anniversary of her birthday, had she not been an example of good principles and good habits? While there have been bad men and women in exalted station and humble station who have carried their vices clear on into the seventies and eighties, and even the nineties of their lifetime, such persons are very rare. The majority of the vicious die in their thirties, and fewer reach the forties, and they are exceedingly scarce in the fifties. Longevity has not been the characteristic of the most of those who have reached high places in that or this country. In many cases their wealth leads them into indulgences, or their honors make them reckless, or their opportunities of doing wrong are multiplied into the overwhelming, and it is as true now as when the Bible first presented it—"The wicked live not out half their days." Longevity is not a positive proof of goodness, but it is prima facie evidence in that direction. A loose life has killed hundreds of eminent Americans. A loose life is now killing hundreds of eminent Americans and Europeans. Look! all ye who are in high places of the earth, and see one who has been plied by all the temptations which wealth and honor and the secret place of palaces could produce, and yet next Tuesday she will ride along in the presence of seven million people, if they can get within sight of her chariot, in a vigorous old age, no more hurt by the splendors that have surrounded her for seventy-eight years than is the plain country woman come down from her mountain home in an ox-cart to attend the Saturday marketing. The temptations of social life among the successful classes have been so great that every winter is a holocaust of human nerves, and the beaches of this tossing sea of high life are constantly strewn with physical and mental and moral shipwreck. Beware! all ye successful ones. Take a good look at the venerable Queen as she rides through Regent Street and along the Strand, and through Trafalgar Square, and by the Nelson Monument. What is the use of your dying at forty, when you may just as well live to be eighty? If you are doing nothing for God or the race, the sooner you quit the better; but if you are worth anything for the world's betterment, in the strength of God and through good habits, lay out a plan for a life that will reach through most of a century. How many people are practically suicides from the fact that their gormandizing or their recklessness or their defiance of dietetics and plain sanitary law cuts short their days! Indeed, so great is the temptation of those who have bountiful tables and full wine closets, that Solomon suggests that instead of putting the knife into the meat on their plate they direct the edge of it across their throat. Proverbs 23: 1: "When thou sittest to eat with a ruler, consider diligently what is before thee, and put a knife to thy throat if thou be a man given to appetite." I believe more people die of improper eating than die of strong drink. The former causes no delirium or violence and works more gradually, but none the less fatally. Queen Victoria's habits, self-denying and almost ascetic, under a good Providence, account for her magnificent longevity. It may be a homely lesson for a sexagesimal anniversary in British palaces, but it is worth all the millions of dollars the celebration will cost, and the laborious convocation of the representatives from all the zones of the planet, if the nations will learn the sanitary lesson of good hours, plain food, outdoor exercise, reasonable abstinence, and common-sense habits. That which Paul said to the jailer is just as appropriate for you and for me—"Do thyself no harm." And here let me say no people outside of Great Britain ought to be more interested in this Queen's Jubilee than our nation. The cradles of most of our ancestors were rocked in Great Britain. They played in childhood on the banks of the Thames or the Clyde or the Shannon. Take from my veins the Welsh blood and the Scotch blood, and the streams of my life would be a shallow. Great Britain is our grandmother. We have read in the family records that without our grandmother's consent, her daughter, our mother, left home and married the genius of American Independence, and for a while there was bitter estrangement: but the family has ended and all has been for us and we shake hands every day across seas. At this queenly anniversary, authorized representatives will be officiating in Buckingham Palace, and our ships will thunder congratulatory wishes in the waters. They are over there, our bone and flesh of our flesh, our John Bunyan, our Wilberforce Coleridge, our DeQuincey, our John Milton, our John Wesley, our John Knox, Thomas Chalmers, our Bishop Channing, our Latimer, our Ridley, our Walter, our Daniel O'Connell, our Robert Lee, our Havelock, our Henry Lawer, William E. Gladstone, our Queen Victoria. Long live the daughter of the Duke of Kent!

Again, this international occasion presses me with the fact that we are competent for political government. God calls her to it. Great fear has been experienced in this country woman would get the right of suffrage, and as a consequence, after awhile, might get into Congressional chambers, perhaps, after awhile, reach the Magistracy. Awful! Well, better your perturbations, as you look across the sea, in this anniversary time, and a woman who for sixty years has ruled over the mightiest empire of all time ruled well. In approval of her government, the hands of all nations waving, the flags of all nations waving, batteries of all nations booming, here! Men have not made such wonderful success of government that they need be afraid that women should take a turn at power. The fact is, men have made a bad mess of it, the most damnable corrupt thing on earth. American politics after men have ruled all their own way in this country for a hundred and twenty-one years, things being equal, for there are among women as well as among men, say other things being equal, women generally a keener sense of what is right and what is wrong than has men, naturally more faith in God, and a better how to make self-sacrifice would more boldly act against injustice and the social evil, and worse might come to this country than a Supreme Court room and a Senate Chamber and a House of Representatives in which manly voices were sometimes heard. Men had better drop some of the stuff of our pompous gait and with a little of superciliousness thrust the thrust of the sleeves of our vests, and be less presumptuous of the other sex, who see the Lord's favorites from the fact that he has made more of them. If women possessed an influential and controlling vote on Capitol Hill at Washington in the English Parliament, do you think that the two ruffian and murderous men of the earth could have gone on their time with the butcheries in Armenia? Cuba? No! The Christian nations have gone forth with bread and medicine and bandages and military relief. Abdul Hamid would have had no more to sit on, and Weyler, the commandant in Cuba would have been thrust into a prison as dark as that in which the murdered Dr. Ruiz. I am no advocate of male suffrage and I do not know what would be best to have it; but I point to the Queen of Great Britain, a woman over which she rules as prosperously reign. God save the Queen, whether now on the throne in Buckingham Palace, or in some time to come in the American White House.

And now I pray God that day after to-morrow, the uncertain skies of England so economic of sunshine, may pour forth light upon all the scene, and that some day when, in Westminster Abbey, the girl Queen took in one hand the sceptre and in the other the orb of empire, there may have been no day so happy as that one in which she shall receive the plaudits of Christendom, and she be strengthened in her aged years to ride the whirlwind of international movement, and her failing vision be illumined with bright memories of the past, brighter visions of the future, and as she quits the throne of earth to have a throne in heaven, and as the of the Eternal Palace are swung, may the question of the text sound in enraptured ears, "What wilt thou, Queen Esther?"

But as all of us will be denied attendance at that sixtieth anniversary coronation, we invite you, not to the anniversary coronation, but to a coronation of the future, to two coronations. Brought here are, to love as no other form of government that which is republican and democratic, we, living on this side of the Atlantic, cannot so easily as those living on the other side of the sea, appreciate the two coronations to which all up and down the globe you and I are urgently invited. If you have such morbid ideas of death that you think of it as going down to a dark cellar, or out on a barren common or as a flagellation; when, so far from a dark cellar, it is a palace, and instead of a barren commons it is a garden, with the brightest fountains that never rainbowed, and instead of flagellation it is coronation, but a coronation eclipsing the one whose sixtieth anniversary is now being celebrated. It was a great day when David, the little boy who was large enough to thrash Goliath, took the crown at Rabbah—a crown of gold and encircled with precious stones—and the people shouted, "Long live the king!" It was a great day when Petrarca, surrounded by patrician youths clothed in scarlet, and crowned by a senator the laurel crown, the people shouted, "Long live the king!" It was a great day when Mark Antony put upon Caesar the mightiest tiara of the earth, and in honor of divine Caesar had it placed afterward on the head of the statue of Jupiter Olympus. It was a great day when the greatest of men took the diadem of Charlemagne and put it on his own brow. It was a great day when, about an eighth of a century from the gate of Jerusalem, under a sky all with thickest darkness, and on a plain trampled of earthquake, and on a plain with the blasphemies of a crown of spikes was put upon the head of our Lord, and the agonized brow of our Jesus. At that particular coronation, amid tears and groans and shivering cataclysms, made your own coronation possible. Paul was not a man to lose his equilibrium, but when that old missionary, looking back and inflamed eyes, got the sense of the crown coming to him, and he said to you, if you will by perseverance and faith accept it, and go into ecstasies, and his robes flashed and his crook straightened as he said to Timothy, "There is laid for me a crown of righteousness," and to the Corinthians, "These athletes obtain a corruptible, we obtain an incorruptible crown." And the Thessalonians he speaks of a crown of glory, and to the Philippians he says, "My crown." The Apostle catches the inspiration and says, "Ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away," and St. John joins in theapture and says, "Faithful unto death, and I will give you a crown of life," and elsewhere exclaims, "Hold fast, for he that takes this crown." Now, crowns! crowns! You expect, in coming here to-day, to be invited to a coronation. You can hardly believe your own ears; but in the name of a pardoning God and a sacrificing Christ, and an omnipotent Holy Spirit, and a triumphant heaven, I offer each crown for the asking. Crowns! How to get the crown? The prophet Isaiah got her crown, on her knees. The eight duchesses and marquises, clothed in silver, carried her train, and the windows and arches and roof of the palace shook with the Te Deum of the organ full diapason. she had to kneel, and she came down. To get the crown of glory and eternal life, you will have to kneel, you will have to come down. Yea! she says that at her coronation not only were assembly wept with profound emotion, but Victoria was in tears. So you will have to have your dry eyes moistened with tears, in your case tears of repentance, tears of joy, tears of coronation, and you will feel like crying out with Jeremiah, "Oh, that my head were waters and mine eyes fountains of tears." Yes, she is sitting in the ceremony seated for awhile on a little stone called the Lia Fail, which, I remember it, as I have seen it again and again, was rough and not a foot high, a lowly and humble place in which to be seated, and if you are to be crowned king or queen to God forever, you must be seated on the Lia Fail of profound humiliation. After all that, she was ready for the throne, and let me say that God is not going to leave your exaltation half done. There are thrones as well as crowns awaiting you. St. John shouted, "I saw thrones!" and again he said, "They shall reign forever and ever." Thrones! Thrones! Get ready for the coronation. But I invite you not only to your own coronation, but to a mightier and the mightiest. In all the ages of time no one ever had such a hard time as Christ while he was on earth. Brambles for his brow, expectation for his cheek, whips for his back, spears for his side, spikes for his feet, contumely for his name, and even in our time, how many say he is no Christ at all, and there are tens of thousands of hands trying to push him back and keep him down. But, oh! the human and satanic impotency! Can a spider stop an albatross? Can the hole which the toy shovel of a child digs in the sand at Cape May swallow the Atlantic? Can the breath of a summer fan drive back the Mediterranean euroclydon? Yes, when all the combined forces of earth and hell can keep Christ from ascending the throne of universal dominion. David the Psalmist foresaw that coronation, and cried out in regard to the Messiah, "Upon himself shall his crown flourish." From the cave of black basalt St. John foresaw it, and cried, "On his head were many crowns." Now do not miss the beauty of that figure. There is no room on any head for more than one crown of silver, gold, or diamond. Then what does the Book mean when it says, "On his head were many crowns?" Well, it means twisted and enwreathed flowers. To prepare a crown for your child and make her the "Queen of the May," you might take the white flowers out of one parterre, and the crimson flowers out of another parterre, and the blue flowers out of another parterre, and the pink flowers out of another parterre, and gracefully and skilfully work these four or five crowns into one crown of beauty. So all the splendors of earth and perhaps of other worlds will join in a procession compared with which that of next Tuesday will not make one battalion, the Conqueror ahead, having on his vesture and on his thigh written "King of Kings and Lord of Lords;" and when he passes through the chief of the twelve uplifted gates, all nations following, may you and I be there to hear the combined shout of Church militant and Church triumphant.

Until the mightiest Musician of heaven shall compose an anthem worthy of that coronation, an anthem chanted by choirs standing on "sea of glass mingled with fire," accompanied by harpers with their harps, and trumpeters with their trumpets, the hundred and forty and four thousand joining in the chorus, I say, until that "Grand March" is composed, we had better stick to Isaac Watt's old hymn, which the five thousand natives of Tonga, and Fiji, and Samoa sang when giving up their idolatries for Christianity:

Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
Does his successive journeys run.
His kingdom stretch from shore to shore,
Till suns shall rise and set no more.
Let every creature rise and bring Peculiar honors to our King.
Angels descend with songs again,
And earth repeat the loud Amen.

The Institution to be Erected at Mayesville, S. C., for Colored Children.

OUR readers who have contributed toward the erection of a building for the Mayesville Industrial Institute in South Carolina, will be glad to learn that the prospects of the realization of this excellent project are bright. The earnest endeavors of the colored people of that section to help the children of their own race to obtain an education, are meeting with general sympathy and encouragement from who have done so much already in the poor little church, which has hitherto been their only place for teaching, this building, plain and unadorned as it is, seems a veritable educational palace. There is something very pathetic in the almost child-like joy with which they look forward to the building of this new hall of learning.

It is estimated that about eight or nine hundred dollars are needed to complete the building fund, so that the Institute may be opened free of debt. This is a comparatively small sum for the realization of so great a blessing. There must be more than a thousand persons who have sufficient sympathy with so praiseworthy an effort to give one dollar each to bring it to successful realization. The proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has consented to take charge of the fund, and Dr. J. E. Stevenson, the Presbyterian minister of Mayesville, Dr. Mayes, the well-known physician of that town, Dr. Dana of Boston, Mass., and Dr. Asa Blackburn, pastor of the Church of the Strangers in New York who knows the Mayesville section well and cordially endorses the project, are all taking a deep interest in the enterprise, and will spare no effort to make it a success.

We heartily commend this Fund to our readers. It has in it the best kind of philanthropy, inasmuch as it is designed to help the colored race in that section to help themselves. It originated in the efforts of a few colored people who had managed to get an education, to teach the colored children who were less fortunate than themselves. The response showed how earnestly the little untaught creatures desired such help. They came in such numbers and from such long distances that there could be no doubt of the existence of the need. The work has been done and done successfully; all that remains is to give it permanent shape and a home which shall for generations to come be the starting-point to these colored children of a useful, happy, and prosperous career. Every contribution to the Fund will be acknowledged in these columns, and we trust that in a very few weeks sufficient will have been received to erect the building.

Immigration Depot Burned.

Many readers of this journal are familiar with the missionary work that has been done at the large government immigration depot on Ellis Island, New York harbor, concerning which we have published illustrated articles at different times. In the early morning of June 15, the main building, which was used as a reception hall for the immigrants, was destroyed by fire. There were about 1500 immigrants of many different nationalities but chiefly Italians, on the island at the time, besides a large force of government employees. As the building was a frame structure throughout, it was soon consumed. Many tugs came to the aid of the imperilled people on the island, and soon all were removed to places of safety. Even the hospital patients were taken out safely. The municipal fire-boats poured great streams of water on the blazing buildings but to little purpose, and the local fire department on the island was found totally inadequate.

Ellis Island is a Government station under the direction of the Treasury Department. Last year, 263,709 immigrants came through Ellis Island. The immigration depot will doubtless be rebuilt at once on a more substantial basis than before.

heaven are to be enwreathed into one coronal for our Lord's forehead—one blazing glory, one dazzling brightness, one overpowering perfume, one down flashing, up-rolling, out-spreading magnificence—and so on his head shall be many crowns.

The world's best music will yet be sounded in his praise, the world's best architecture built for his worship, the world's best paintings descriptive of his triumphs, the world's best sculpture perpetuate the memory of his heroes and heroines. Already the crown woven out of many crowns is being put upon his brow. His scarred feet are already ascending the throne. The grandest throne of all time and all eternity is the one that Christ is now mounting. The most of us will not see the consummation in this world. But we will gaze on it from the high heavens. The morning of that consummation will arrive and what a stir in the holy city. All the towers of gold will ring its arrival. All the chariots will roll into line, the armies of heaven which John saw seated on white horses passing in infinite cavalcade. The inhabitants of Europe, Asia, Africa, North and South America, and of all islands of the sea, and their neighbors. A practical evidence of this is that Col. T. B. Johnston, of Sumter, S. C., learning that his land at Mayesville was desired for the site of the new building, spontaneously offered the trustees an acre worth at a low valuation two hundred and fifty dollars, for one hundred dollars. He did this as a mark of his appreciation of their efforts for the elevation of their race, and with sincere wishes for their success. The trustees gladly availed themselves of this liberal offer, and so the first step has been taken toward raising the long-desired building.

On this page we give a picture, from the architect's plans, of the building it is proposed to erect. As will be seen, the trustees have wisely determined to spend no money in ornament, but to have a plain, useful, substantial edifice, specially adapted to educational purposes. The ground plan provides for the main recitation room, a library, a room for the kindergarten class, reception room, matron's office and a number of rooms for the industrial education of both sexes. The upper story will contain more class-rooms and accommodations for boarders.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

First Converts in Europe.

Sunday School Lesson for July 4. Acts 16: 6-15. Golden Text: Psalm 119: 130.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

I will be remembered that when Paul had appealed to Barnabas to accompany him in visiting the brethren left behind in their first great missionary journey, the strife about Mark had led to the separation of these two brethren who had been called by the Holy Ghost unto this line of service together. It is significant that it is said of Paul and Silas that they departed, "being recommended by the brethren unto the grace of God." (Acts 15: 40), while of Barnabas and Mark such is not recorded. Barnabas sailed to Cyprus where they had first commenced, and Paul went by land in a northerly direction, throughout Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches. In retracing the route he had taken with Barnabas, Paul came to Derbe and Lystra, and in the latter city found his beloved Timothy, who from that time became as a dear son, than whom Paul had no man like-minded. (Phil. 2: 20). The fruit of this journey was manifest: "The churches were established in the faith, and increased in number daily." Such is of a healthy church. Throughout his former journey, we never read of any difficulty experienced by Paul in obtaining clear and precise direction from the Lord. Now there comes a change, the guidance given by the Holy Spirit is only negative. The chosen witnesses of the Gospel who were under the charge to go "into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature" (Mark 16: 15), were now "forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the Word in Asia. . . They assayed into Bithynia; but the Spirit suffered them not." What did it mean? Was the Holy Spirit grieved by the contention with Barnabas, and must Paul be humbled and dealt with as a little child whose guidance by the parents is so largely negative? Or was God exercising his servant's faith, and putting him to a test whether he would obey, and remain quiet and confident in his God, when it might seem to him that precious time and precious opportunities were being wasted? Probably both were true. Strife and divisions are among the works of the flesh (Gal. 5: 19, 20), and even if Paul had been in the right, it would have glorified God more had he left him to deal with Barnabas. And God the Holy Ghost, in his jealous love for the Apostle Paul, may have withdrawn for a time his more positive direction that this precious instrument might learn, through this humiliation, to walk more softly, and in more dependence upon his God.

Paul was loyal: he stood the test; neither his love to souls nor yet his great natural energy of character betrayed him into a step of disobedience. He did not argue that the directions of the Spirit were contrary to the express command to go into all the world, but meekly and lovingly obeyed, and passing by Mysia, came down to Troas. Now he could be trusted again with positive direction. "A vision appeared to Paul in the night; there stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia and help us. Some might think a mere vision too slight an indication to follow in such a crisis. When a man is intently waiting for a revelation of his will, God will show whether a vision is from him, or whether it is one of those dreams which come from a multitude of business." (Eccl. 5: 3). The apostle was no longer in doubt. He had followed the negative guidance which he had received until he had been brought to the seashore. The cry of the Macedonian, from the other shore of the same sea, what could he do but take ship? Paul and his little company "assuredly gathered that God had called them to preach the Word in Asia." In such journeys we are not told how the apostle and his companions traveled, how their fare was paid, or whether they worked their way. In the work of the first missionaries finances seem to have had no place. The use of the pronouns "us" and "we" lead us to conclude that Luke the physician was with them in this voyage. He probably remained at Philippi, until Paul's later visit, after which again the use of "we" (Acts 20: 6), indicated that Luke left Philippi for Asia with Paul.

God's blessing was on this first missionary journey into Europe. No shipwreck as in Acts 27. Paul's tests just now were on another line. "We came with a straight course unto Samothracia, and the next day to Neapolis, (a seaport of Macedonia), and from thence to Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia." How should they proceed? What should be the first steps taken by

MISSIONARY PIONEERS?

They were in that city "abiding certain days." What did they do there? We are not told how Paul's company were was a conversion after God's own heart and after Paul's own heart. It was only a woman, some may say. God knew that: he knew what he did when he chose a woman to be the first European Christian. Lydia has had her sisters in later times, and during the whole history of the Church in Europe there have been anointed women whom the Lord has called, from time to time, to bear witness for him, when their brethren have not been small enough or weak enough for him to use. The foundation of the Church in Europe was well laid, but when the Son of Man cometh, shall he find the faith in Europe?

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

A MOMENTOUS event is described in the lesson. The introduction of Christianity into Europe has had a more potent influence on human destiny than have battles or revolutions or social convulsions. Whether Paul contemplated taking this step when he started on his journey is doubtful. In his conversation with Barnabas, about it, he merely proposed going over the route of their former missionary tour and visiting the churches already planted. But now that his hands were set free by the council at Jerusalem, and he had no reason for apprehending the silly and vexatious intermeddling of the Judaizing sticklers for the law, he may have cast a longing eye on distant lands. Or it may be, as Luke seems to imply, that the bold project of entering Europe was not in his original plan. His companion was Silas, or Silvanus, one of the two men sent by the Jerusalem Council to corroboration, they received direction as the course and passing the places where the road branches off toward the north, the south, they kept on toward the eastern coast. On their way they left of the decree of the council with the church, so that if any of the Jews should come the people might not be troubled by them. At Lystra, Tarsus, whose conversion we noticed in a previous lesson, was added to the party; and Troas, a town on the coast of the Aegean Sea, about four miles from the site of the ancient Troy and near the Dardanelles, appears to have joined them. They should not directly stated, but as from them, he uses the pronoun "we" instead of "they," we infer that he accompanied three travelers. It has been suggested that Paul was sick and therefore took the company of a physician would be welcome. At Troas a peculiar invitation came to them. Paul had a vision in which a man of Macedonia, a region included in European Turkey, begged them to come there. Accepting this as divine guidance they crossed the sea, a voyage of sixty-five miles, to Neapolis, the port of Philippi. The ruins of the wall and an ancient gate show where Philippi once stood. It was named after Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, but at the time of Paul's visit it was a Roman city. The Jews appear to have had no synagogue there, but were accustomed to meet for prayer at a place outside the walls, as in other Roman cities. Thither, as was his custom, Paul went on the Sabbath, and conversed with the women who made up the congregation. One convert at least was made, and others. Luke's habit was to select incidents, so it may be that the only other converts, but Lydia's conversion is the only one mentioned. She is described as a seller of purple of the city of Thyatira, that is to say, Thyatira, her birthplace. She evidently resided in Philippi, as she entertained the missionaries. The incident indicates that in the colony had a more independent position than in Oriental lands. Lydia was in the selling either the dye or dyed fabrics, possibly both. We do not hear a word about her in the New Testament, but conversion is interesting as being the first in Europe of which there is any record.

Whose heart the Lord opened. Dr. S. Robinson, speaking of Lydia's conversion, says: "There were five evidences of its being genuine: 1. A heart: an open mind; an open mouth; an open hand; and an open house." "Wherever Christianity goes it does good, the people are the better for it, and these first missionaries to Europe were their first convert grateful and hospitable, so the missionaries of our day have gratitude in the heathen to whom they have carried the Gospel. When MacFarlane visited New Guinea he brought him a large present of provisions. He asked the meaning of it, an old chief replied, turning to his men: 'Look here! See how we have been changed since missionaries came to us. Formerly when white men came here they had to come armed to the teeth; we can land safely without fear of harm to us. Look at those men of another island swimming to the shore. A few years ago they would have been killed and eaten as soon as they came ashore. Now they are well received, helped by our people. The missionaries have taught us how to live.'

The Spirit suffered them not. Christ promised the Holy Spirit that he would be a guide, and find him guiding these first missionaries to the place where people were to hear the message of the Gospel. Dr. B. Hooker, describing his voyage to the Gulf of Mexico, gives a typical illustration of such guidance. As the ship went down, a cold and furious blast from the north came upon us. The sea became intense. Here and there the shoals and other dangers. Great waves prevailed among all on board. A shout came from the sailor on the deck, 'There's the light!' The sound rang through the ship, to the relief of every passenger. The vision of the steamer was now known, safety was over and quietness in the quiet waters of the river.

employed, but we can take it almost for granted that it was in prayer. By this time they had discovered a place where prayer was wont to be made, for Philippi being a colony, the knowledge of the true God had penetrated there.

Finding, as it seems, only a company of women, Paul sat down and spoke to them. Was it, could it have been, the prayers of this little group of women which led God to send his chosen instrument so far? Was it the prayers of a few women which first led to the preaching of the Gospel in Europe? Who knows how many important issues for the kingdom of God have hung upon the prayers of a few simple weak ones, unknown on earth but registered in heaven! Lydia, one of this little band of women, was well known as a woman of business, a seller of purple. She was one of the colonists, having come from Thyatira in Asia Minor, where, probably she had met with some disciples of Christ. This woman "worshipped God," and may have stirred up the little group of women around her to cry to God for some one to teach them the way of the Lord.

The words of Paul met the long felt need. God had brought together the earnest seeker and the God-sent teacher, and the first living stone of the infant church in Europe was thus laid. Hers was a simple, but thorough conversion. God opened her heart, she attended to the things which were spoken by Paul, and she was baptized and her household. The Word of God, the things which were spoken by Paul had entered into and taken possession of her opened heart, and at any risk to her business or her personal reputation, she and her household confessed Christ publicly by baptism. This rate Paul's report of the decision about the Gentiles. He had remained at Antioch after the object of his mission was accomplished, and when the quarrel with Barnabas left Paul without a companion, Silas was ready to accompany the Apostle. It must have caused Paul a pang to separate from his old friend to whom he was indebted for many kindnesses; but he was never so ardent a lover of peace as to sacrifice principle to maintain it. To the last, he had a keen sense of his rights and the disposition to fight to secure them. He who boasted in one of his epistles that he withstood Peter to the face because he was to be blamed, was not likely to yield to Barnabas. He had his own opinion of Mark, a man who had deserted the party on the former tour, and he did not want to have any more to do with him. As Barnabas persisted, apparently having a truer estimate of Mark's character, the idea of a joint tour was abandoned, and Barnabas with Mark as his companion went to Cyprus, his native land, and we hear no more of him in Luke's narrative. Paul appears subsequently to have discovered that he was mistaken as to Mark, for in his letter to Timothy (11. Tim. 4: 11), he expresses a wish to have the young man with him and admits that he was profitable, or useful, in the ministry. This shows that even an inspired Apostle when he found that he had been mistaken was not too great to acknowledge his error.

Setting out with Silas, being recommended by the brethren, (from which we conclude that the church at Antioch took the side of Paul in the dispute), Paul went northward into Galatia, where he turned westward along the Roman road. In some way, either by vision or providential indi-

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

TWO CHINESE HOLIDAYS.

the Christian, the Other Heathen, and Both Took Place in New York. A Strange Contrast.

THATHER a striking contrast of two widely different phases of Chinese life in America was afforded in New York a few days ago. On a bright and breezy June Monday, shortly after 11, a large party of gaily-dressed Chinese assembled on an excursion dock on East River. The occasion was the picnic of the Brooklyn Chinese Sunday Schools. There are nine in all. Every school was represented by a full contingent of pupils and teachers, the attendance of Chinese being about 600. All the arrangements were in charge of a committee of five, elected by the schools, the committee being Wong Kwong Sing, Liu Chu, Chu Loung K. Kew. Besides the Chinese there were about 300 white persons, men and women, who are interested in the progress of the Sunday Schools, and many of whom are warmly interested in the civilization of the Chinese who come to this country. It was a very merry party that steamed up the Hudson to Hempstead Harbor, and no more enjoyable trip could have been planned. The children, whose employments confine them indoors all day long, were delighted at the outing, and returned to the city feeling invigorated and refreshed, with the memory of a pleasant day well spent. Another outing of a similar character is now being planned by the New York Sunday School Union, which will take out the pupils of the Chinese schools in the metropolis for a day at Long Island. On that occasion the Chinese Consul and staff will honor the excursion with their presence, and the Peilong evangelist band will also be there to assist in the religious service. Every year brings new interest in the Chinese Sunday School work, and it is unquestioned that the spiritual results are even greater than formerly. Quite recently a new mission and Sunday School was opened by native Chinamen for the benefit of their countrymen in Pell street, the center of Chinatown.

During the same week in which the Chinese were enjoying this trip, their heathen fellow-countrymen were making extensive preparations for a celebration of a very different sort. In anticipation of the approaching 1500th anniversary of the birth of Kwan Yung and the Pung, two very celebrated Chinese deities, all the heathen Celestials prepare to visit the "joss house" in Mott street, recast in their finest raiment, and spend a whole day in feasting, incense-burning and making offerings to the gods. Large sums were spent in this heathen celebration, and the Chinese priests must haveaped a rich harvest of gifts through the superstition of their dupes.

What a strange contrast this, between the two holidays; the one a happy, wholesome, innocent outing under pleasant auspices amid Christian surroundings; the other, a stifling, gloomy, heathenish gathering before painted idols in a heathen temple, in the heart of the capital city of Christian land!

Admiring Praise.

There are times when it is wise and best to give a word of praise to a child, rather than such a word the little heart will link with discouragement. A father took up to a map his little son had laid out and pinned on the wall. He stood before it a long time in silence, and in silence walked away. The little fellow was sitting in the room, and his father knew he was there. He was watching with his age-old eyes, waiting anxiously for a word of approval. As none came, his poor little face fell unhappily. Straight into the room walked the father, and said carelessly: "Robert has drawn a very clever little map in there. Look at it when you go in." "Did you tell him it was clever?" asked a judicious listener. "Why, no. I ought to have done so. I never thought to mention it." The unspoken word meant little to the father, but a great deal to the child, whose heart would have been cheered even by a hint that his work was appreciated.

Man's Friend the Horse.

Mrs. T. T., of Marblehead, Mass., writes this voluntary pledge:

I will do all I can to prevent the dumb creatures from being abused. If we see them abused and keep silent we are doing wrong. I believe we should speak a word in favor of those who cannot and not in the face. One ought to write on tinted paper and to read books only well printed. It is unwise to read in the railway car, in a carriage, in walking, in bed, or when recovering from an illness. Milton is said to have become blind by the excessive use of his eyes during an attack of dyspepsia. The best hygienic conditions are important; damp neighborhoods often produce weakness of vision.

Domestic Points of Difference.

There are in every household, certain topics, which, when they are discussed, always give rise to differences of opinion. This being recognized, it is wise to avoid them, especially if they are not essential to domestic peace and happiness. How foolish it is, says a recent writer, to have these stock subjects of disputation, about which there is always friction and irritation, amounting, perhaps, in the course of years to positive alienation. It is not well to expect too much of others, being mindful of the fact that we ourselves make large demands upon their patience or toleration. Very beautiful is it when two people, after some trifling experimental knocks and jars, have settled down in

OUR NEIGHBORS AND OURSELVES.

O WHAT a selfish, cruel thing This captious old world is! Our neighbor plainly sees our faults, And clearly we see his. We think our neighbor's vision dull, We think our own is keen; We think ourselves so generous While he is small and mean. We've time to see how others err, We've time to criticize; We seize upon each other's "motes," With "beams" in our own eyes. We see the motives of our friends And hastily condemn; They have no charity for us, And we have none for them. We think there's no church quite so good As that where we belong; And others think their own is right And all the rest are wrong. O what a blessed world 'twould be If we should exercise The love that hides another's faults— His good to recognize! How sweet a thing might life become If we could gladly own That other people might be right And not ourselves alone. If we could but unselfishly Acknowledge honest worth— Rejoicing in another's joy— Then heaven would be on earth. If vanity and pride were dead, If selfishness could cease, God's kingdom then would come with power— His reign of love and peace. O God, possess these hearts of ours— Let sin no more benumb— But let thy will be done on earth— O let thy kingdom come!

Vineland, N. J. MRS. FRANK A. BRECK.

SCOWLING.

DON'T scowl, it spoils faces. Before you know it, your forehead will resemble a small railroad map. There is a grand trunk line now from your cowlick to the bridge of your nose, intersected by parallel lines running east and west, with curves arching your eyebrows; and O, how much older you look for it! Scowling is a habit that steals upon us unawares. We frown when the light is too strong and when it is too weak. We tie our brows into a knot when we are thinking, and knit them even more tightly when we cannot think. There is no denying there are plenty of things to scowl about. The baby in the cradle frowns when something fails to suit. "Constitutional scowl," we say. The little toddler who likes sugar on his bread and butter tells his trouble in the same way when you leave the sugar off. "Cross," we say about the children, and "worried to death," about the grown folks, and as for ourselves, we can't help it. But we must. Its reflex influence makes others unhappy.

We should possess our soul in such peace that it will reflect itself in placid countenances. If your forehead is rigid with wrinkles before forty, what will it be at seventy? There is one consoling thought about these marks of time and trouble—the death angel almost always erases them. Even the extremely aged in death often wear a smooth and peaceful brow, thus leaving our last memories of them calm and tranquil. But our business is with life. Scowling is a kind of silent scolding. It shows that our souls need sweetening. For pity's sake, let us take a sad iron, or a glad iron, or smoothing tool of some sort, and straighten these creases out of our faces before they become indelibly engraved upon our visage.

A Boy's Religion.

If a boy's religion be good for anything at all, it is unfeigned, and it will be found in a majority of cases, that it comes from his mother. Every boy needs religion—not a gloomy, morbid religion that makes him moody and nervous and unnatural, but a bright, cheery, practical trust in the Christ of the New Testament, as the natural companion of a boy, as his helper in the struggle with temptation, as the link between the beautiful world without and the heart within, every boy ought to have. When you deprive him of it by trying to teach him theology first, or by requiring that he shall feel—or say that he feels—just the same sort of religious experience at conversion that you went through, you do him untold wrong. A boy's instinct is a pretty safe guide, if you give him the Bible and a Christian mother.

A CHINESE SUNDAY SCHOOL EXCURSION.
(Sketched by a "Christian Herald" Artist.)

When I see a horse being whipped by a man my indignation and pity are aroused and I cannot help speaking. The horse knows more than the man that is whipping him. I have seen men, when backing a team, if it did not go just where they want it, they vent their spite on the poor horse by beating and sometimes by kicking it. Would a man abuse a child when it gets contrary as I have seen them abuse a horse?

Be Careful of the Eyes.

Constant strain in an artificial light is the worst thing for the eyes. In our large cities and towns, the fierce glare of the electric light, indoor or out, is a severe test to the optic nerves, and the general use of electricity for illuminating purposes may not improbably result in increasing the proportion of ophthalmic disorders. Concerning the care of the eyes, an optical expert furnishes these simple hints: Do not write, nor read, nor sew, or do any sort of work which requires an effort from the eyes or in an insufficient light. If compelled to do so, always close the eyes from time to time. The colors most restful for the sight are green and blue. Do not surround yourself by colors too strong. Red is blinding. Prefer the softer tones in textures, in furnishings. A great contrast of color is equally fatiguing. The light ought to come from the side mutual adaptation and adjustment, having thoroughly learned the art of living together in close accord.

Two birds within one nest;
Two hearts within one breast;
Two souls within one fair,
Firm league of love and prayer
Together bound for aye, together blest.
An ear that waits to catch
A hand upon the latch;
A step that hastens its sweet rest to win;
A world of care without,
A world of strife shut out,
A world of love shut in.

"Rose Day."

One of the prettiest features of the Victorian Jubilee in London this week is the universal display of roses, the British national flower. It has been proposed that everybody taking part in the celebration shall wear the national floral emblem, and the additional proposition is made that June 22d shall hereafter be known throughout the Queen's domains as "Rose Day," in honor of the jubilee. In some parts of our own country there is a growing interest in the observance of a "Rose Sunday" in mid-June, when the "American Beauties," "Marechal Neils" and other splendid varieties are in their loveliest bloom.

Victoria's Jubilee.

IT is beautiful to see how many nations join in celebrating Queen Victoria's Jubilee. It is common in our land to deplore the fact that in monarchies the accidents of birth decide who shall reign. But, is that worse than the accidents of politics? Could poorer or more unfit people get office than those who at various times in various departments have held authority in this country? Both republican and monarchical forms of government have their advantages and defects, and which shall finally take possession of the world, or whether neither of them shall become the universal government, is known only to him who is ruler of nations and to whom thrones and presidential chairs are only footstools. May Victoria keep the throne until someone by every qualification of intelligence and virtue and faith in God is prepared to mount it.

Years ago, in a railway train going from London to Liverpool, an Englishman said to me: "I do not see how you Americans endure a change of ruler every four years. I should think it would keep your nation in a state of perpetual uncertainty." My reply was, "The American form of government is not charged with as many uncertainties as the English form. Having elected a ruler, he is sure to stay in authority for four years, if he lives, while in your country any year a change of sentiment on Irish home rule, or a question of war with some foreign nation may throw one administration down and lift another, and now it is Gladstone and now it is Salisbury. Political changes are not so sudden in America as they are in England."

So I answered my fellow-traveler. Still, I think England has the best form of government for her, and the United States the best form for us. If we don't like ours, we can go there, and if they don't like theirs, they can come here. It is becoming quite frequent now for Americans to decry American institutions. These critics have been abroad long enough to get a foreign accent and ape foreign customs, and come home with enough airs to make their presence a disgust, and then ventilate their anti-Americanisms. My wonder has been why they stay here among all our American barbarisms, when transatlantic passage is so cheap, and they could so easily be spared from a residence on this side of the sea. The simple fact is they know there are no skies arched like the American skies, and no land where society is struck through with such contentment as here, and that the opportunities which open in our country are grander than any other the sun shines on. It is the easiest place to make a living, and more liberty is granted to a man while he behaves and quicker justice seizes him if he don't. Long live the republic!

Need of a Divine Help.

WE do not believe there ever was a real atheist in all the world. Napoleon was on a ship's deck bound for Egypt. It was a bright, starry night, and as he paced the deck, thinking of the great affairs of the State and of battle, he heard two men on the deck in conversation about God, one saying there was a God and the other saying there was none. Napoleon stopped and looked up at the starry heavens, and then he turned to these men in conversation, and said: "Gentlemen, I heard one of you say there is no God; if there is no God, will you please tell me who made all that?" If we have no God to comfort us when our fortune goeth, and we look upon the graves of our children, and our houses are desolate, what will become of us? What a sad thing it is to see men all unhelped of God, going out to fight giants of trouble; no closet of prayer in which to retreat, no promise of mercy to soothe the soul, no rock of refuge in which to hide from the blast. When the swift couriers of trouble are brought up, champing and panting for the race, and the reins are thrown upon their necks, and the lathered flanks at every spring feel the stroke of the lash, what can we do on foot with them? How can we compete with them? If having run with the footmen they wearied us, how can we contend with the horses?

Humiliation and Exaltation.

IT is only as we humble ourselves that God will exalt us. The Pharisee whose prayer was self-glorification, how did he go down to his house? He took none of the peace of God down with him. He thanked God for the things he was not; that he did not grind the face of the poor; that he was true to his wife; that he did not collect taxes for the Romans. He found all his satisfaction in this. How was it with the other one who went to the temple, at the same time? He went down to his house justified. God accepted his prayer and said, Go in peace! What was his petition: "God be merciful to me a sinner!"

We may approach repentance by calling to mind our own sins. Perhaps that is the more usual way. But, there is another process. "Not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance." Our meditations on the scenes of Gethsemane and Calvary, sad though they may be, when we think of what the Saviour suffered for us, are really meditations on God's unspeakable gift. What the Saviour suffered is only preliminary to his present glory, yes, man's future glory, all of which is expressive of his goodness. Our sorrows are to be associated with the goodness of God. In the end, we must take the cup of salvation and call upon the name of the Lord!

There are works that are meet for repentance: the repentance of the heart. What I pray, I say to God in words. What I do, I offer to God in deeds. Look over the year since the last season. You have neglected your Bible, your church-services, the prayer-meetings, the weekly lecture, the gift upon the Lord's altar. You have, perhaps, done far worse than this. In covenant with God, as one of his people, look at the manner in which you have kept, shall I not say, have broken your covenant. From this summer how shall it be till the next one? We go into the future world by these annual stages. How many more summers God will grant us none of us can tell. Perhaps this will be the last. Oh what a glorious unfolding would come to the church of the living God, if she came up from the sepulchre, leaning upon the arm of Him who is the Resurrection and the Life!

A BASKET OF BERRIES.

LAST! for those to whom a berry is not a berry, who have no midsummer day-dreams among their vines, who can read no antique poems, or taste no flavor of antiquity, in their plate of ripe red strawberries! No wonder the Latins called them fragaria. How fragrant they are! Is it not pleasant to think that they were indigenous to the wild green woods of England, and that our painted Celtic ancestors found them around their wicker huts? Roman soldiers, Saxon thanes, Norman barons, prudent monks, English men and maids of all stations, and all ages, have been familiar with this delicious berry. Ah! memory has no more subtle spell, than we can find in a basket of strawberries! Not only a red, but a white and green strawberry used to grow wild in England. The scarlet strawberry is a native of Virginia and was brought to England in 1625. Chili gave an excellent variety to France, and Alpine Switzerland has a delicious native berry. And here is a hint that may be worth something to American cultivators who live near the sea-shore. In the Isle of Man, they cover the plants in winter with sea-weed, and the result is a prodigious increase in the size of the fruit.

No fruit has so many poetic memories as the strawberry. It is the rose of fruits. Shakespeare frequently mentions them. What American in London, can pass by Ely Place in Holborn, without seeing the street converted into a garden, and the pavement into rows of strawberries.

My Lord of Ely, when I was last in Holborn, I saw good strawberries in your garden there; I do beseech you send for some of them!

quoth Richard the Third to the bishop, in that scene of frightful calmness which precedes his burst of thunder against Hastings. His sending the bishop to get him some strawberries, just before he assails Hastings with furious and unjust abuse, is one of those subtle but natural felicities it took that splendid mystery, William Shakespeare, to think of.

There is no poet that can overpraise them; they deserve all the good things that can be said of them, and the old writer is not wrong when he says, "God has not made a better berry, though doubtless he might have done so." Let us then eat and be thankful! Perhaps in the fields of Heaven and on the hills of God, we may hereafter find our favorite berry, sublimated, and beautified with the taste of Paradise in them.

The raspberry which many think nearly as fragrant and delicious, also grew wild in English woods from the earliest times, but neither Tussar nor Gerard, though familiar with the red raspberry in the sixteenth century, mention the white rasp. This variety came undoubtedly from Antwerp. The gooseberry does not appear to have been known to the ancients. Gerard calls it feaberry, a name I have heard given to it, forty years ago in Yorkshire. It received the name of gooseberry from being used as sauce to young, or green geese. It was brought from Flanders in the same year as Henry the Eighth received the title of Defender of the Faith, and even as late as the reign of Elizabeth its leaves were eaten as a salad by those who could not afford to send to Holland for a lettuce.

The blackberry was well known to the Romans. Pliny tells us that the propagation of trees by layers was taught the ancients by the bramble bush:

Some bow their vines which buried in the plain, Their tops in distant arches rise again—Virgil. They were also aware of the medicinal qualities possessed by blackberries in all diseases of the mouth and throat. Another wild berry which they shared in common with us was the whortleberry, or bilberry, or huckleberry; to which both Virgil and Pliny give the name of vaccinium. The Highlanders of Scotland eat them with milk as we do, but they also make of them a jelly flavored with whiskey, which we do not do. The Duke of Athol, a little more than a century ago, discovered a pure white variety growing in the woods between his seats of Blair and Dunkeld. Cranberries are found all over the world in marshy places. England, which has a small, fine variety, imports them largely from America. She has also of late years cultivated a kind called snowberry, which is pure white, and was brought from Nova Scotia, though it is also found in the swamps of her newly-acquired territory, Cyprus. This cranberry has a perfumed taste like can-de-noyau, or bitter almonds.

The mulberry is mentioned several times in the Bible, and Ovid celebrates it, in his famous story of Pyramus and Thisbe. It was introduced into Europe from Persia, and was more esteemed by the Romans than any other fruit. It did not reach England until 1548, but the trees then planted at Sion House are still alive. A few years later both black and white mulberries were growing all over England. James the First greatly favored this tree, and large numbers of it were planted in his reign. One of these old mulberry gardens was the rendezvous of fashion during the Commonwealth, and is now Arlington Street. The mulberry grows well in America. There are immense native groves of it in Texas, and it is worthy of remark, that it breeds no vermin and harbors no caterpillar, except the silkworm.

See then how easy it is to eat our berries to the romance and the fair humanities of the older world: for berries touch our common history at many points, though haply man or woman who can also link it with their own peculiar idyl—with the idyl of summer holidays and childish friendship and love's young dream. Such can the delicious juices, the days when in sunshine, and they loved to wander and get sunbrowned and eat berries.

The United States Consul at Zanzibar home about the recent emancipation of slaves in that country, says: "It was many persons that the effect of freedom would be to throw many thousand negroes upon their own resources, and that great suffering would ensue for three or four years; what I can see not one person will suffer the slightest degree. In my opinion, not one of the present generation of slaves will be masters."

THE BIBLE

AND THE NEWSPAPER

Attempted Assassination.

ARIS was startled on Sunday June 13 by the news that an attempt had been made to assassinate M. Faure, President of the French Republic. The President was on his way to Longchamps, when the attack was made. He was proceeding by the Bois de Boulogne, and had the place where, thirty years ago, shot at the Czar, when a bomb was under his carriage. It exploded and report and for a moment there was general consternation until it was found that no one had been hurt. The President retained his coolness and passed on as if nothing had occurred. The bomb was picked up in the roadway. It was a very small affair, consisting of a pipe about six inches long, two inches in diameter and half an inch thick. It had been loaded with powder and swan shot. The perpetrator of the outrage appears to have made his escape. A detective, who was near the President is said to have seen the bomb-thrower and pursued him: the crowd seeing him run, mistaking him for the would-be assassin, seized him with canes and umbrellas. The other policemen rescued him and bleeding from the angry mob, who would have lynched him. He made three arrests of men who were suspected of throwing the bomb, but gave satisfactory accounts of himself and they were released. An impression prevails that the crime has no political motive, but was the work of a lunatic. Sensational journals unkindly suggest that the whole thing was organized by the President as a stage trick to arouse sympathy: and one journal before the outrage was perpetrated, declared that the police were arranging for some such attack to be made on the President. This however is scarcely credible, as he could no advantage accrue to the Government from such a plot. In former times the President has been imputed to some anarchist or imperialist: but now the political members of both parties agree that the republic is too firmly established to be overthrown by a crime. Nothing could change the form of government but the misconduct of the rulers themselves. It is with governments as with individuals: their undoing does not come from their enemies, but from their own iniquity. To every fallen man, as to every lost man, the same words apply: "Thy doings have procured these things to thee." (Jer. 4: 13.)

Russian Tragedy.

Interesting facts about the recent revolution in Southern Russia are given by a correspondent in a communication to the Christian Herald. It appears that in the neighborhood of Tiraspol there is a sect of a strange fanatical sect known as the Askolniki, the leader of which was a beautiful woman named Vera Makarova, who was known to the sect as Sister Vitalia. One of the beliefs of the sect is that the only way to inherit eternal life is by self-denial, the suppression of all physical appetites and desires, by self-torture, and at the end of the process, self-destruction. The existence of the sect came to the attention of the authorities at the last census. The authorities could not obtain any answers from members of the sect to the questions they were required to put. They refused to tell them the number, the ages of their children. Sister Vitalia told them that the Government had ordered the census in order to get the members of the Greek Church, and that if the children's names were entered they would be claimed by the priests of the church, and their souls would be lost. All who refused the information required by law were imprisoned. Sister Vitalia among them. There another peculiarity was discovered. The members of the sect would not eat. They believed it was a mortal sin to eat out of vessels which had ever been used by unbelievers. They would have starved to death in prison rather than eat the food provided for them, if the Governor, becoming alarmed, had not ordered their release. It appears that the Tiraspol branch of the sect, under the teaching of Sister Vitalia, came to the conclusion that they were ripe for heaven. The survivor of the group, Feodore Kovaleff, says that they longed for the crown of martyrdom, and demanded that he give it them by burying them alive. He was less fanatical than the others, but under their persuasions he yielded. Six persons, including his wife and two children and Sister Vitalia, went down into his cellar, and there Kovaleff buried them alive in the sticky mud. He says that his only regret, as he saw their faces lighted with faith and ecstasy, was that he could not lie down and be buried with them. The police found the dead bodies in the cellar, as Kovaleff said. He desires to die, and hopes he will be executed, but he will probably be sent to an asylum for the insane, although on all other questions but religion he is perfectly rational. But in religion—like those whom at their own desire he put to a cruel death—he is most irrational. If they had understood the character of God better they would have known that it is not by self-torture, or by self-immolation that he is pleased. The prophet's words still need to be proclaimed the dark places of the earth:

What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God? (Micah 6: 3.)

A Novel Weapon.

The police of Lynn, Mass., are looking for a half-blinded highwayman who has been terrorizing bicycle-riders and pedestrians for some time past on the outskirts of the city. The injury to his eyes was incurred in the pursuit of his business. The proprietor of one of the drug-stores of the city, who is an enthusiastic bicyclist, had occasion a few days ago to visit a friend at Salem, and being detained, was riding home after ten o'clock. On his way, he noticed some person among the trees by the roadside giving a peculiar shrill whistle which sounded like a preconcerted signal. About half a mile farther, he came to a dark place in the road, where he deemed it prudent to go slowly. He had heard of the attacks on bicyclists, but at that time he was thinking more about avoiding obstructions than of possible attacks. He was just emerging from the shadow, when he caught sight of a figure crouching by the roadside, and the next moment a stout cane was thrust between the spokes of his wheel and he was thrown off. He managed to fall on his feet and was prepared for his assailant who came to him with the gruff demand to give up his watch and his pocketbook. He put his hand in his pocket as if to comply, and drew out a syringe filled with ammonia. He discharged the contents full in the highwayman's face. The man gave a yell of pain and put both hands to his face. The bicyclist jumped in the saddle and pedalled with all his power toward Lynn. He arrived safely without further molestation and reported his adventure to the police who are trying to catch the highwayman, now with the clue that he must be suffering from the effects of the ammonia. Probably no one but a druggist would have thought of this novel mode of defence, but it answered the purpose. So it has been in other conflicts. As David prevailed over the giant with a sling and a stone, so in Christ's warfare no man need think himself powerless against evil: he has some gift, or kind of metal helium is: the only thing known about it is that it exists in the sun and that no metal on earth known to scientists gives the same lines in the spectrum. It seems probable that this crystalline substance is helium, and if so, the question arises whether the aërolite from which it was obtained was cast off from the sun or from some other planet or star. It may be that all the celestial bodies have the same element in their composition. Of that we cannot be sure, but the presence of this strange metal and its identity in the spectrum with the lines of the sun, show that the stone is not of this world but is of celestial origin. The analysis of the Christian's character should yield an analogous result. It ought always to contain so large a proportion of love and kindness as to prove that it is part of the divine nature:

By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one to another. (John 13: 35.)

Checks in a Junkshop.

A tiresome search has been going on for several days over acres of waste paper in the junkshops of Chicago for some missing checks and drafts worth six thousand dollars. It appears that in packing the safe one night in the county treasurer's office, a basket containing the checks sent in by a number of property-owners in payment of their taxes was inadvertently left outside. The colored janitor found it there the next morning, and concluding that it contained waste paper, emptied it into a sack and sent it away with other waste to the junk shop. It was not long before the loss of the valuable papers was discovered and steps were taken to recover them. A list was made of all the junk-dealers who buy the waste paper from the offices, and two men were detailed to each store to search for the papers. A more tedious, uninviting task cannot well be imagined, but it was prosecuted until one of the searchers in a Desplaines street store fished out the whole of the precious papers. If men will take so much trouble and persevere in disagreeable work to find lost money, Christians ought not to be deterred from seeking in the slums and the abodes of vice and poverty the lost souls which are far more precious.

What man shall there be among you that shall have one sheep, and if it fall into a pit, will he not lay hold on it and lift it up? How much then is a man better than a sheep? (Matt. 12: 11.)

Insidious Anodynes.

A warning to persons who are in the habit of taking patent medicines and of treating themselves for real or fancied ailments, was issued a few days ago by Dr. George F. Shrady, the famous New York physician. The doctor has found a large increase of late among the habitués of opium, morphine and cocaine and has set himself to discover the cause. He believes that it is not due as it formerly was to the prescriptions of physicians, who have now learned that there is a serious danger in prescribing anodynes for their patients. They know that it is better for the patient to suffer pain than to acquire the knowledge of a drug that may enslave him. But while the physicians have been more careful, the public has gained the knowledge of these dangerous anodynes in other ways. Dr. Shrady says that many of the remedies advertised to alleviate pain induce an appetite which is worse than the pain itself. Multitudes of men and a still larger number of women have in this way become victims of an insatiable craving which demands to be periodically satisfied with ever increasing doses. The remedy gives them relief from suffering and they have recourse to it whenever they have a headache or any trifling malady until they become so accustomed to taking it that they cannot do without it. Many of these remedies contain opium, morphine or cocaine and the patient unconsciously contracts in taking them, an appetite which he cannot shake off when he tries. The last state of that man is worse than the first, and the physicians have acted wisely in keeping from the knowledge of their patients the drugs which, while giving temporary relief from suffering, enslave and destroy them. The faithful minister, too, is often placed in circumstances where his people desire comfort, which it is his duty not to give. He has to tell unpalatable truths and turn a deaf ear to appeals for false hope.

Who say to the seers, See not, and to the prophets, Prophecy not unto us: for we speak unto us smooth things, prophecy deceits. (Isa. 30: 10.)

THESE ALL HELPED STRICKEN INDIA.

Their Gifts of Corn are Now on the Way to Calcutta—A Splendid Record of Christian Generosity—The Corn Cars Received—Bishop Thoburn's Cablegram.

ONE OF MANY CORN CARS THAT CAME FROM THE WEST.

PROBABLY no mission of succor and mercy in which a people ever engaged has afforded more joy and delight in the doing, than has the work of aiding suffering India. Churches, schools, societies, village communities and little groups of Christian men and women all over the land have worked and prayed together, till the result has been a great harvest of help which the good relief ship Everett is now carrying over the sea to Calcutta—a city now doubly afflicted, in view of the recent earthquake. The Everett's cargo is valued at $60,000, and it has been insured in the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Co., which has generously agreed to reduce the premium one-half, thus practically making a donation of $425 to the Relief Fund. All who have had a share in the work will watch with interest for news of the food-ship's arrival.

When the decision of the Fund managers to send money, instead of a second cargo of corn, was communicated to the Secretary of the Navy in Washington, that official promptly sent this reply:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON,
June 8th, 1897.

My dear Sir:—I am in receipt of your letter of the 7th inst., and believe that you have taken the right course in sending money instead of grain. Very truly yours,
JOHN D. LONG.

LOUIS KLOPSCH, Esq.

This approval has been echoed on every side. Missionaries and others, who have had experience in India, unite in declaring that the delay in securing a second steamship made it inexpedient and even unwise to send a cargo of corn from New York to India at this late season, and that the better course was to send money instead. Letters of congratulation on the change were also received from U. S. Senator Hale, Speaker Reed and others who had helped the work in Congress.

In order that the local appropriations may be made in strict accordance with the necessities of the case, an Inter-denominational Relief Committee has been formed in India, under the Chairmanship of Bishop J. M. Thoburn, with headquarters at Calcutta. To this Committee the sum of $40,000 has been cabled from the Relief Fund, as stated in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD. We had hoped to receive in time for this issue a cabled report announcing just how this money had been apportioned, but the committee, presumably, has preferred the more economical method of sending their communication by mail.

The reasons why we selected this course, in the future work of the Relief Fund in India, were:

FIRST. That at this distance it is impossible to accurately determine the exact extent of the suffering in any one district, and this can be readily done by a Committee on the spot.

SECOND. It avoids duplication, as the Committee organized represents all the American Protestant missionaries in India.

THIRD. It can administer the fund more prudently and judiciously and can therefore achieve better results, than would be possible under any other arrangement; and

FOURTH. The existence of such a Committee creates a local centre in India, to which all the missionaries operating in connection with the Fund will be directly responsible and to which detailed reports of their work in the various districts will be submitted, these reports, in due course, to be published in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the information of the Fund contributors and our readers generally.

The choice of Bishop Thoburn, as head of the Inter-denominational Committee, gives general satisfaction. His cabled message gives evidence of the hearty zeal with which he enters upon the work before him. It is as follows:

"NAINI-TAL, INDIA, June 15.
"KLOPSCH, New York.
"I accept gladly. God bless you!
THOBURN."

Probably no selection that could have been made would have been so cordially welcomed by all the missionaries, both at home and abroad. Rev. Dr. C. C. Creagan, of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in New York City, said: "I consider Bishop Thoburn one of the greatest missionaries of modern times—a man who has the confidence and respect of Christian people of all denominations. No better man in all India could have been selected for the work."

As some have asserted that the statements of mortality and suffering received from the missionaries were overdrawn, we give space to this extract from a letter from Lord Radstock, the well-known evangelist. The writer says:

"Some seem to imagine the famine is over; but few seem to realize that at this moment a part of that empire, with a population equal to that of Great Britain and Ireland, are living in districts where there is actually 'not enough food to maintain life.'"

"Nor is this all; for in the Central Provinces there is only one relief station for every 280 square miles, and the weak or those enfeebled by famine cannot get there, while an enormous number of others, from caste feeling, or from unwillingness to abandon their homes, refuse to seek government relief. And house-to-house visitation by the missionaries is the only way of saving life. I have figures which show that over 100,000 died in one district last year of famine out of 2,300,000 population."

"The missionaries in their endeavors to relieve the suffering are battling against overwhelming odds, and are most inadequately supported. Let me give a few facts out of very many. Even one and a-half years ago some parents were selling their girls in one district, and villages were depopulated. In one district this year 200 a month were dying of starvation; in another thirty a day were dying in the Government poorhouse; in another, people who have been living on roots and berries now have not even these."

"Owing to the enormous area (250,000 square miles) where crops have failed, leaving only half a crop, or even a quarter crop, there is a general rise of prices; so that in large districts not reckoned by the Government of India as being in the thirty-seven millions of 'famine area,' prices are 200 or 300 per cent. above the normal. The consequence is an awful lingering starvation going on. Hundreds of thousands have died. In one district the magistrate said he could collect 8,000 orphans, and this showed that their parents (at low estimate 8,000) must have died; besides many others of the children, who must have died in large numbers, for they die first. In one orphanage, 150 died in three months after they were received, having been enfeebled by previous privations."

"And yet all this must get worse, as there can be no more grain till after the autumn crop is gathered. The rains coming next month will develop fever, smallpox, and cholera later. I believe all the Christian funds together do not reach $250,000—little more than enough to gather, house and clothe the 8,000 orphans alluded to in one district. Unless speedy help is given much more generously, it is feared that missionaries will have to refuse the orphans who will be offered to them by hundreds next month. And what will become of those orphans? They will die because of the ignorance or indifference of many who bear our Lord's name, and who practically say of their fellow-subjects, 'Am I my brother's keeper?'"

Special acknowledgment is due to all our friends who took an active personal interest in the movement to send corn to India, all of whose offerings are fully represented in the cargo of the City of Everett, which sailed, according to programme, from San Francisco on June 12 for Calcutta.

THE CORN OFFERINGS.

Below is the record of the cars of corn for which bills of lading have been received up to June 12, together with the car numbers and consigners' names. Each of these gifts is represented by a corresponding quantity of corn in the Everett's cargo, now on the way to India:

India has now entered on her suspense. In a few days it will be known whether the present suffering will continue and increase for another year, whether relief may be expected in the west monsoon brings rain there will be a harvest four or five hence. We are thankful to learn that Madras rain had begun to fall, indications of its spreading northward.

Miscellaneous Contributions TO THE INDIA FAMINE FUND.

ENG the progress of the Relief work, number of contributions were received, many of which were unaccompanied by the names of the Senders or Town from which the gifts were sent. It was not practicable to classify these contributions and publish simultaneously with others who send with the usual data. We have now these unidentified gifts on a single page, so that the contributions, thus sent, amount to $2,439.81.

Gospel Triumphs in Persia.

with each other as to whose the privilege of inflicting the first dagger stroke should be. A few Nestorian women, who were Mohammedans, through the influence of zenana workers have with their husbands been converted to Christianity.

Of late the Presbyterians have turned their attention to the Armenians and Jews. The mission work in Persia is very slow. One reason is because there is such a wide channel between and not much sympathy among the workers and the natives. If Mohammedans are to be brought to Christ, Christian workers ought to live in closer contact and more sympathy for their nation, customs and habits. The need for workers is great, the encouragement among them is also remarkable.

Socially, the condition of the women of Persia is a most interesting study.

After marriage, they wear the yashmak or native veil over the lower part of the face, covering the mouth, as a sign of complete subordination to their husbands under all circumstances, right or wrong. "A woman's voice must not be heard by men or old women," is a familiar saying. If you ask why the yashmak was instituted, the answer comes, "because of woman's tongue. She talks too much." On the other hand the women themselves will say: "Because, once upon a time, many years ago, there was a very handsome woman with a beautiful chin and mouth, and for the love of her a monk broke his vow and lost his soul. Since then, the heads of families in Christian communi-the food to the mouth: but it is quite an art to do this skilfully, without disaster to one's dress.

Our hostess' home is a building of thirty feet by twenty, and only fourteen feet in height. Its board floor is carpeted and serves the three-fold purpose of sitting-room, eating-room, and bed-room. Sometimes it is even used as a kitchen, and there are homes in the mountains which, like the Ark of Noah, use the general room as a place for the fowls and domestic animals. Some houses I have known to contain the beasts of the fields, creeping and jumping creatures, and even snakes find an abiding-place among the beams and pillars, and lay their eggs in the recesses. There are no time-pieces in the ordinary Persian home, but the crowing of the cock wakes the household, and its screeching solo serves as an alarm. Dinner is announced by the lowing of a cow, and supper-time comes when we hear the flapping wings of the flying creatures, as they steal to their night's rest. Most of the houses are built of sun-dried brick and easily crumble. In Persia, architecture, especially in the villages, is far from attractive, and the squat appearance of the houses surprises one who has been used to the sky-scrapers of New York. Suffering and persecution through centuries have aided in producing a style of architecture peculiar to itself, and in some villages the dwellings are so closely set together that one can walk over the roofs from one end of the place to the other. These village homes have no windows; instead the roof is perforated with two or three small round openings, which serve as ventilators. Volumes of black smoke and foul air ascend through these openings, and sunshine, fresh air, snow and rain pour in at them, summer and winter. In winter, the houses are exceedingly cold, but the occupants keep near the tandoor as much as possible. People don't have much to do during the winter months—especially the men folks, so they have plenty of time to set their feet against the tandoor and enjoy its warmth.

In many houses there is in the wall a kariy, or small window, just big enough to admit a man's head. It is five feet above the floor, and is used as a post of observation to warn the inmates of the approach of an enemy or the presence of danger. At the west end of the general room is the kitchen. The tandoor is a cylinder of red clay, usually about four and a half feet in length and three or four feet wide on top. This clay, after being jar on shoulder. She washes her face and hands in the overflow streamlet, comes home, makes a fire, and begins to cook for the day. She makes the dough into small round balls, puts them on a clean cloth near the stove, and next rolls the balls until they become very thin. Then she takes the dough in her hands and very carefully and skilfully throws it from one hand on the other, until it becomes almost as delicate as paper. It only takes a few seconds for each cake to bake thoroughly. Then it is quickly taken off and thrown on a clean cloth, and it is ready for serving. Our housewife then sets her pots in the tandoor to keep warm for dinner and supper. She sweeps and cleans up a bit, freshens her own toilet somewhat and then sits down at her spinning machine, or her loom, for she weaves carpet, sews, and embroiders, knits and crochets. During the spring and summer she plants the seed, weeds the cotton fields and vineyards, reaps with her sickle the wheat and barley, picks the grapes and makes them into raisins and molasses, and fills the store-house with good things for the winter.

TRAINING CISAMBA BOYS.

FROM Dr. W. T. Currie, the eminent medical missionary, who is laboring in Central Africa, comes the following encouraging report of his progress in giving technical training to the boys of his station. As will be seen, he hopes not only to teach them how to support themselves and improve their condition, but to present an object lesson to the natives of the effect of Christian association. Dr. Currie writes:

"You will be pleased to know that we are pressing forward steadily, if not as rapidly as we would like. The disturbances in various parts of Africa do not affect us. Our relationship with the Portuguese and natives is very friendly.

"Under the instructions of Mr. J. D. Smith, our young men are sawing good boards, and making them into window sashes, doors and furniture. We have work on hand now, to keep the carpenter department going for one year; and we expect it to be nearly self-supporting.

"The ladies, ever eager to do a little more for Christ, have added to their other work, a kindergarten for the very young in the neighborhood, and every morning a crowd of as happy little blacks as you will find anywhere, gather in that school.

"We are giving special training to the young men engaged in Evangelistic work, in the hope of fitting them for greater usefulness in the growing work in which they are engaged. As it is, they are now fully able to hold their own with any young men in the country, in every honest and manly calling of native life; and the people know ties have induced their married ladies to veil the mouth and chin." Of course, this is a mere legend, but it is nevertheless true that sometimes for twenty years after her marriage, a woman does not speak above a whisper, and occasionally even whispering is forbidden. They are silent except by signals with head and hands, and it is a wonder that they do not lose the voice and power of conversation altogether. Our educated women, however, don't consider themselves bound by such traditions, and they have more or less disregarded the use of the yashmak.

About eight p.m. supper is served upon a wooden table, four inches high and about three and a half feet long and three feet wide. Instead of a tablecloth, flat cakes of bread are laid down, and a bowl of soup and meat with cheese and pickles as accompaniments. We all eat from the one bowl with our fingers, using neither knives nor forks. The thin cakes of bread are so pliable that they can be twisted into any shape desired and used for carrying well burned, or baked, becomes black with a smooth, shining surface. A place is dug in the floor in which the tandoor is set and it is then used for baking, cooking, and warming purposes. Near it usually stands the family cradle, an affair of most venerable pattern. Usually the house is in charge of the mother or the wife of the oldest son. She is a good housekeeper, rises betimes in the morning, about five A. M., kneads her dough for an hour and covers it warm by the tandoor while waiting for it to rise. She then goes to the well with it. In the past, many spoke tempt of our school and declared would become old women, the be unable to carry a load, build or trade. This is all changing; the leading native traders put the other day, I thought I ought to boys to school at the coast, and they have come back knowing a Portuguese; but they are drunkards respect their own father; and fools. If I had sent them to they would likely have turned be men. We find great encouragement in this. We firmly believe that can send a band of intelligent manly, well behaved young Christians, in and out among the villages, will do more to lead the people than a dozen foreign missionaries.

possible tribute to his generalship. Joseph, after being defeated in a bitterly contested battle, led his great caravan of two thousand horses or more, on which were women and children, the aged, the wounded, the palsied and blind, by a seemingly impossible trail, interlaced with fallen trees, through the ruggedest mountains to the Bitter Root Valley, where with the cool wisdom of a Von Moltke or a Grant, he made a treaty of forbearance with the inhabitants, passing by settlements containing banks and stores, and near farms rich with stock, but taking nothing and hurting no one. So he pushed on; he crossed the Rocky Mountains twice, the Yellowstone and Missouri rivers, and was within one day's march of Canada when he was taken.

I hope that Joseph may grow old gracefully and that it may be true of him, "that at even-time there shall be light."

Prior to the earthquake the weather was excessively hot and abnormally oppressive, even for India. Towards evening these conditions became more marked and the shock followed. It was one of the most extensive earthquakes India has experienced in many years, and it will be a considerable time before the full results are ascertained. We are glad to inform the readers that a sure specific cure for Asthma and Hay-fever is found in the Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery from the Congo River, West Africa. Many sufferers report most marvelous cures from its use. Among others, Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, Editor of the Farmer's Magazine, and K. J. J. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, were completely cured by the Kola Plant after thirty years' suffering. Mr. Lewis could not lie down at night in Hay-fever season for fear of choking, and Mr. Combs was a life-long sufferer from Asthma. Hon. L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, writes that for eighteen years he slept with his head under the water, worse in Hay-fever season, and the Kola Plant cured him at once. It is truly a most wonderful remedy. If you are a sufferer would advise you to send your address to the Kola Importing Co., 1104 Broadway, New York, who to prove its power will send a Large Case, by mail free of cost, to you, and if you do not feel cured, it needs it. All they ask in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

An extraordinary sunset followed the earthquake—so remarkable, according to the cable, that it amazed even the terror-stricken people of Calcutta, who regarded it with dread lest it should portend another shock. At Jacobabad, near the Beloochee frontier, the thermometer marked 126 degrees in the shade—a temperature, as far as records show, unprecedented in India even during the hottest months of the summer season.

CHAPTER XIV.
Jessie's Hard Lesson.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

"CAN I perform a miracle?" Jessie demanded. "No matter how much will I have, for such an undertaking I have not the strength."

"Then I think I will go for you," said Steve.

"All right! You may as well go there as loaf around John's office."

"Jessie, I must go to Europe next Saturday."

"What do you say?"

"I must go to Europe. Mother and Alice need me."

"I need you, too."

"You can get along very well without me, Jessie. I am only needed to escort you to drawing-rooms, or hold your fan or bouquet. John will look out for a country place if you really wish one, and there you will have no use for me."

"Don't be absurd Steve! And for heaven's sake don't look so lackadaisical and lassorn."

Then Steve shrugged his shoulders, and rose to leave the room, and Jessie set down her coffee cup and looked curiously into the pained, sombre face of her husband. He was going out with the listless trail his thoughts induced when she called him back.

"Steve," she said, "if you see mother tell her I will certainly come to-morrow or the next day."

"I shall not go to see her—I could not give her such a message."

"You are as disagreeable as you usually are."

"Is there any other thing I can do for you?"

"Stop in at Thorley's and order some orchids for me."

"Anything else?"

"Don't get your ticket for Europe. I want you here."

"Mother has asked nothing from me for three years, Jessie. I am now going to Europe to bring her safely home."

"You shall not go."

"I shall assuredly go to Europe on Saturday next, as you will go to the ball to-night." And the declaration was a true one, though neither of them at that hour knew how awfully true it was.

Then Steve went down-town to talk with John about a country place, and to take a passage for England, and Jessie leisurely finished her breakfast and glanced at the headings of the daily papers. Before she left the room she lifted again her mother's letter, and this time read it to the last word. It pained her, and it angered her.

"Why didn't mother put off writing for one day longer?" she mentally exclaimed.

"Then I would have answered her letter in person—I want to do right—but every one and everything is against me. I am sure I have been very good to father and mother, and Steve has done everything in the world to make them happy; mother knows my days are cut into fifty pieces—she is unreasonable—and that is the long and the short of it. Poor father! I am sorry for him! He was always so cheerful and so patient, and so hardworking, so happy to get us any little pleasure; as for Flora it is easy for her to be at home; one place is as good as another to a woman in her position; what disagreeable children she has!"

Then she rang the bell, and ordered her carriage, and went down to Tiffany's to see if her opals had been reset to her satisfaction. She expected Steve to be at home for dinner, but he was not present; so then she concluded he had gone to comfort her mother after all. "It would be just like him," she whispered, and it did please her to think of the duty being done; did please her that anyone would do it for her; for she was not willing in any way to weary or disappoint herself in order to fulfil it. Not was she angry with herself for her selfishness. She was only angry with destiny for not arranging her duties at convenient times, and with her mother for putting before her as a duty what she wished to regard as a kindness, within her own time and convenience.

It was an unpleasant day altogether. The nurse said the children were cross; the housekeeper had trouble in the kitchen; there were some disagreeable callers, and when her dress came home and was tried on, several alterations were needed. She had determined to rest herself and keep her mind as composed as possible, and after all she was in such a state of nervous tension that she could not begin dressing, until some restorative had been taken. She ordered a cup of strong tea, and poured into it a stimulant. It was not an habitual thing with her; she knew it was destruction to her complexion, and that it always produced in her an exaltation of feeling that approached recklessness, but she considered that there would be plenty of time before leaving home, for this exaltation to become a pleasant languor or high-bred ennui.

But the contradictory, annoying spirit which had dashed all the day was not exorcised by her personal stimulation. Two things were specially aggravating—Steve's absence, and the sick headache of her maid. "Steve," of course "has missed the train," she reflected, "and now he cannot be home until it is full time for me to leave the house. I shall have to wait for him. It is too bad," and just as she came to this conclusion she was told that her usual dresser was "unable to lift her head and that Corinne," the French nurse, "would take her duty at Madame's toilet."

"It is a part of the whole day's misfortunes," she thought, as she gloomily seated herself before the glass—"the Lloyd's coming back just at this time—mother's sickness—father's calamity—Steve's going away when I want him to take charge of our removal to the country—the house in insurrection—sick children—sick maid, and Corinne to dress me for the ball of the whole winter! I wonder what evil star is over me?"

Poor Corinne had a bad hour of it. The beautiful dress on which French modistes had exhausted their taste and skill, was declared to be "an abominable failure." It was too tight. It was not becoming. It was bad style. In vain the opal necklace flashed its sprite-like flames above the gorgeous silk and lace; Jessie was thoroughly dissatisfied with her appearance. However, there was at last one good thing—she heard, through all her grumbling and complaining, Steve's strong, quick step, and she sent Corinne to tell him that she was already dressed and waiting for him.

As the girl hurried on her mission Jessie suddenly remembered that she had not examined "the hang" of the dress. She arranged the glass for this purpose and walked off to see the effect of the long train. The lights were above her head. She wanted light lower down. She lifted two of the wax candles burning at the side of her mirror, and set them on the floor. The next moment she was in the midst of mounting flame. Piercing shrieks filled the house, though she retained her self-control and tried to stifle the blaze. It was impossible. She herself was burning, and with the crazy impulse of unspeakable terror and agony, she fled towards the door.

At that moment Steve came leaping down stairs to her rescue. Once before, in California, he had heard those shrieks of burning humanity, and he divined what calamity had now produced them again in his ears. In his flight he had seized a blanket and in this he enfolded her. Servants were already flying hither and thither for doctors; but it was some minutes ere Steve mastered the flames, and could carry his insensible wife to her bed.

Overwork, worry and nervous excitement are ruining the health of thousands. By its peculiar curative power Hood's Sarsaparilla makes pure blood and steady nerves.

His own hands and face were burned, but he knew it not. His suffering was all for the agonized woman, who came but too soon, to the knowledge of the intolerable pain she was enduring. In fifteen minutes there were half a dozen physicians at her side, and she was told that her life depended upon her self-control and resistance to the shock she had received.

Fortunately Steve's injuries were but surface burns, but it was an awful night in that darkened room where the beautiful Mrs. Lloyd lay moaning in woeful agony, the dreadful hours away. The opals had been taken from her scorched throat, and the magnificent dress was now only a mass of burned and torn fragments. But the ball of which she was to have been the particular star, went blithely on. The news of the event spread rapidly, and most of the dancers were well aware of the tragedy. They talked about it in whispers for a few moments. They said "Poor Mrs. Lloyd!" And they waltzed till day-break at the ball for the Princess Kara.

CHAPTER XV.

Coming Back.

There was now no question of Steve's going to Europe for his mother and sister. They left their pictures, bronzes, china, &c., &c., in proper storage, and returned at once to America. But they were not able to give either sympathy or assistance as Jessie positively refused to see any one but her husband and her hired nurses. Her fate remained for two weeks in a balance that the smallest trifle might turn to the grave; but her extreme physical suffering probably saved her life. For pain is a great conservator of nervous strength. It draws the scattered life forces all to the centre of being, and rallies them for a last desperate effort for existence. In Jessie's case, at least, this was the result finally attained; but her convalescence was delayed by a very severe attack of fever.

So that chamber of luxury and beauty in which she had dressed herself so magnificently for admiration and for triumph, became for weeks and months a place of almost inconceivable sorrow and suffering. Ah! If life could throw open to us beforehand its long suites of chambers! If from some secret station we could see the halls of tragedy and the rooms of retribution we should have to inhabit, how terribly the anticipation would haunt us! But there is instead the blessed certainty that God reserves calamities in his own hand to inflict them in due season, and that he never tortures us in advance of the due season.

It was a terrible summer; but Steve bore it with a love and patience that was almost divine. No fretful reasonableness moved him to a voice was ever the voice of in and affection. His touch was mother's, and deft and easy as man strong to lift, and to bear, the long, hot days, and the sul he sat at her side and ministered smallest want. Only while she leave her for such rest or refreshment he could obtain in those prements. And he did not lose heart at first, she seemed unmindful of tion. He remembered that b is the most exacting of feeling hoped for the hours of rest coming. At length, one night, a messenger to her. As Steve looked at her he doubted whether she lived on she breathed it was not perceptible senses. He knelt down and, hand, prayed inwardly for her's.

tender renewal of their interest in each other, there had been no explanations.

Midsummer Outing.

REPARATIONS for the opening of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn are now complete, and when our readers peruse these lines, the first party of tenement children will be already on the way there, if not actually in possession. Rev.
Dr. A. D. L. Jewett, the owner of the beautiful property on which the Home stands, has this year generously renewed the privilege he has extended to the work during the last three seasons, and placed the ample buildings and grounds at the disposal of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as freely as before, so that our army of children will be once again provided with a delightful summer shelter and grounds where they can romp and roam to their heart's content. It is expected that the number of wee folks to be accommodated this year will average as high as at any season since the work began.

As many of the children who arrive at Mont-Lawn come in dilapidated clothing and shoeless, the Matron and staff will be pleased to receive any gifts of clothing and footwear that may be forwarded by friends of the work. These should be suitable for boys between the ages of six and ten and girls from six to twelve, and can be addressed to the Matron of the

A Sufferer Relieved.

A TALE OF SUFFERING AND SUBSEQUENT RELIEF.

From the Press, Columbus, Ohio.

One of the many persons in Columbus, Ohio, who have been benefited by the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People is Miss Jerusha McKinney, of 50 South Centre Street. Miss McKinney is well and favorably known, especially in educational circles, as she has been for a number of years, a faithful and progressive school teacher.

For some time she has been very ill and the sufferings and tortures endured by her for months have been unusually severe.

The tale of her sufferings and the subsequent relief and final cure which she derived from the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, aroused considerable agitation among her many friends and others.

A reporter was detailed to obtain a reliable account of this marvelous case, and when he called he found Miss McKinney at her comfortable and cozy home where she cheerfully complied with his request. She said:

"The first indication that I had that anything was radically wrong with me was about three years ago. I suffered the most excruciating pains in different parts of my body and was almost crazed at times. My sleep was disturbed by horrible dreams and I had begun to waste away to almost a shadow. To add to my other afflictions the malady assumed a catarrhal turn and I was soon a victim to that horrible as well as disgusting disease. I consulted the family physician, who gave me some kind of a nostrum and I was foolish enough to imagine that it benefited me. I followed the advice of the physicians but noticed no perceptible improvement in my condition, and was about to despair of ever becoming a strong and well woman again.

"Some of my lady friends were calling on me one afternoon, and before them I happened to mention my troubles, when one of them recommended that I try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. I had never had any faith in medicines of that kind and paid but little attention to the suggestion. It was not long after this, however, that I again heard the pills highly recommended, by several persons, and then it was that I decided to give them a trial and purchased one box of the pills. I soon began to notice an improvement in my condition and before the whole box had been taken my health was so much improved, that I was about ready to begin singing the praises of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

"I was not yet thoroughly convinced and decided to wait awhile before growing enthusiastic over the results, and had begun on the second box before I was confident that I had at last found a medicine to meet the requirements of my case. I discontinued my calls to the physicians and have left them alone since. I am now as well and strong as I ever was in my life; am entirely free from all pains and never felt better in my life. I eat regularly and sleep like a babe. No more are my slumbers haunted with fearful dreams and when I retire at night I go to sleep at once. I regard Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People as my salvation, and would recommend them to all ladies troubled as I was. The pills are more than what is claimed for them and anyone giving them a trial will soon come to the same conclusion regarding their merits that I have."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People contain all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are for sale by all druggists, or may be had by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y., for 50c. per box, or six boxes for $2.50.

HAWAII MAY COME IN.

Of Heathen, Beautiful "Paradise of the Pacific" Seeks Annexation—Outlines of the Treaty—A Land of Great Gospel Possibilities and Material Wealth.

HAWAII, the loveliest of all the island groups of the Pacific, and the most progressive, has sought annexation to the United States. A Treaty of Annexation has been prepared, signed by our Secretary of State and by the representatives of the little island republic, and laid before the Senate with every prospect of ratification. Unless some unforeseen and radical change occurs in the programme, within a very short time Hawaii will be incorporated in the Union and her people be in the full enjoyment of the rights and privileges accorded by the American Constitution. It is not expected that any very serious obstacle to annexation will be encountered in any quarter. Britain, the nation most directly interested, although chagrined at the loss of what she may have regarded as a prospective acquisition, has recognized the right of our government to take the step it has taken, especially in view of the fact that annexation has been repeatedly urged by the people and government of Hawaii themselves. Japan, whose large emigration President Dole and his Cabinet decided to exclude from Hawaii after a certain date, has protested against the adoption of a mid-ocean republic by our States under the protection of Stars and Stripes. This protest, however, will probably be tactically adjusted between the two governments. Countries have made rapid progress in civilization and Christianity in Hawaii. Indeed, the whole group of islands has been the finest mission and educational fields the world has ever seen. Even the arrival of missionaries, in the heart of the century, people of these islands had already heard of the "man's God" and had turned of their own idols wrought a revolution in the religion of the island group, for on an October day in 1819, a great bonfire was made of the images, and idolatry was declared forever abolished from Hawaii.

But though these islanders had thus boldly immolated their once-beloved idols and abjured their ancient faith, they were still in spiritual darkness, for they were utterly without a religion. No one had yet brought the Gospel of Jesus to Hawaii. What they had heard from the traders, while it had doubtless precipitated the fall of the old heathen worship, had not enlightened the islanders, and they were in the peculiar position of a people without a God. They were, however, in a receptive attitude and eager for the truth, and when on March 31st, in the following year, the American brig Thaddeus, landed the first Christian missionaries, Hiram Bingham and Asa Thurston, two devoted men of God, they were heartily welcomed by the simple Hawaiians. Their preaching was blessed beyond all expectation and a remarkable spiritual awakening resulted.

Hundreds were converted and baptized in a day, and soon many thousands of the once savage people became pious and exemplary Christians, sincere in their profession of faith and consistent in their lives. Churches, chapels and schoolhouses sprang up at many different points in the island group, and within a few years, they were conducted partially at least, by native teachers. These have multiplied and now there are many beautiful schools in the islands, besides a number of flourishing churches with good-sized congregations. The Hawaiians, in turn have become missionaries, and have given the Gospel to many of the Chinese and Japanese who have come to the islands during the last ten or fifteen years. It is estimated that the present population of the islands includes 24,000 Japanese, 20,000 Chinese, 15,000 Por-

They realized that their images were impotent, meaningless, the work of men's hands, and that the priests who strove by every means to command to maintain the prestige of the old heathen religion, were impossible. This became a fixed conviction in the minds of the people, and it quickly ston and H.W. Kenney for Hawaii. The gold pen was used for the signature, and then, after all had been completed, a photograph was taken of the scene. The message transmitting the treaty to the United States. President McKinley stated that the incorporation of the Hawaiian Islands into the body politic of the United States was a necessary and fitting sequel to the events which, from a very early period of our history, has controlled the course and prescribed the association with the United States and the Hawaiian Islands. He reviewed the history of that period since 1820, when the first American representative agent was sent there, to name the treaty of friendship and commerce in 1826. In 1851, the cession of the islands was formerly offered to the United States and although not then accepted, this government proclaimed its intention to preserve alike the honor and dignity of the United States and the safety of the Hawaiian Islands. The President in 1893 the course of the United States policy toward the Hawaiian Islands has consistently favored autonomous welfare with the exclusion of foreign influence save our own, to the extent that eventual annexation as the necessary result of that policy.

The Treaty which has been sent to the United States declares that the Republic of Hawaii cedes absolutely to the United States all rights of sovereignty over the Hawaiian Islands and their dependencies, and are hereby annexed to the United States under the name of the Territory of Hawaii, and the latter also cedes all harbors, harbors, buildings, military posts, etc. It is provided that the laws of the United States relative to public lands shall apply to Hawaii, and special laws are to be enacted by the American Congress. All revenue from the sale of Hawaiian lands, other than what is required for governmental purposes, is to be set aside for the advancement of public education in Hawaii. Civil, judicial and military control shall be exercised by the United States, and all the necessary officers are to be appointed by the President in the Hawaiian Islands. Hawaii's existing treaties with other governments cease at once, and her governments are temporarily suspended in force, and the customs system of the United States assumes control. The United States assumes the public debt which is not to exceed $1,000,000. Chinese immigration under the Hawaiian laws is suspended. Five commissioners, two being native Hawaiians, are to be appointed by the President to consider and recommend to Congress such legislation as may be necessary concerning the territory.

Accompanying the message was a report from Secretary Sherman, opposing the annexation policy. He takes the ground that the act contemplated by the Treaty is not a cession, "but union, involving the complete incorporation of an alien sovereignty into the body politic of the United States." He cites as a parallel instance the scheme of 1869 for the annexation of San Domingo, which was never completed.

Immediately after the signing of the Treaty and its transmission to the Senate, notification was sent by the government to the British Foreign Office of its action with respect to the proposed annexation. Japan, through its minister at Washington, filed a formal protest against annexation, on the ground that it would operate injuriously against Japanese subjects in Hawaii, would repudiate pending claims by Japan, would affect customs duties secured by treaty, and would revoke perpetual treaty rights. Japan has various claims against the island republic which she does not desire to sacrifice, but it is not probable that her protest will create any complications that cannot be adjusted satisfactorily with the United States.

In the Sandwich or Hawaiian group there are in all twelve islands. They are the most northerly cluster of the great Polynesian Archipelago and extend about 360 miles from S.E. to N.W., lying in the Pacific Ocean between lat. 18 deg. 55 min. and 22 deg. 20 min. N., and longitude 154 deg. 55 min. and 160 deg. 15 min. West. Hawaii, the largest island, contains 4,040 square miles, but Oahu, being more central and having a good harbor, is the seat of government. The other islands are Maui, Kauai, Molokai, Lanai, Niihau and Kahulawe. In early days these islands had a dense population, and in 1832 a census gave the figures at 130,313, which has steadily decreased. The group was discovered by Captain Cook in 1778, and it was through the teachings of Cook and Vancouver that the natives were induced to abandon their idols.

One year after his discovery of the islands, Cook met with a tragical death at the hands of the natives. One of his ship's boats had been stolen, and Cook decided to compel restitution by seizing the person of the king. He landed with a crew of marines, but the natives attacked so vigorously that the boats were obliged to withdraw. Cook, being the last to retire, was struck down upon the beach and killed in the presence of his crew who were unable to aid him. A monument now marks the scene of this dark tragedy, which seemed to serve as a connecting link between the old and the new order of things on the islands.

Although the Hawaiians are unquestionably of the Malay type, they are among the finest races of the Pacific, physically and intellectually. Since being educated and Christianized, they have shown themselves capable of a high degree of civilization. They are even tempered and pleasure-loving, gentle in manner, and very affectionate in all their home relations. Their language is a soft, liquid tongue, with only five consonants, and an abundance of vocalic sounds. In manners and dress they are rapidly becoming Americanized, and their principal city, Honolulu, is not unlike some of our western seaboard towns. There are nearly 200 Protestant missionaries on the islands, and the total membership of the native churches is about 14,000.

A Venerable Southern Church.

ONE of the oldest and best known religious edifices in the South is the Episcopal Parish Church of St. Michael in Charleston, S.C. This church was established in 1751, and work on the building began in the following year. It was opened for divine worship Feb. 1st, 1761. In 1780, it was exposed to the fire of the British artillery on James Island. In the Civil War, the old church was struck four times by the Federal artillery on Morris Island and considerably damaged. In August, 1885, it was shaken and injured by a cyclone and in the great earthquake of August 31st, 1886, it was almost destroyed. Through the generosity of friends in South Carolina and other States the venerable building has been lately restored and is now as shown in our photograph. It is an imposing structure and is specially dear to the people of Charleston because of the many trying experiences it has undergone.

An Aerial Pulpit.

is a huge rock, known as "The Devil's Tea-Table," which hangs over the river high above the valley. A few weeks ago Rev. John Bonnett, a mountain evangelist, announced that he would preach from this rock, naming a recent Sunday as the day for the service. During Saturday night and early Sunday morning the back-woodsmen and their families began gathering at the foot of the rock, and by eleven o'clock over 1,000 persons awaited the advent of the preacher, who soon appeared on the edge of the rock and delivered his sermon from a pulpit 200 feet above his congregation, his text being, "On this rock I build my church." It was the most unique and impressive service ever held in the State of West Virginia.

From Sea to Sea.

The following message was sent from California to Rev. R. Ashley Cake, the Life Savers' Missionary at Port Republic, N. J. "I am so glad for the good work you are doing, and the sweet light you are carrying and shedding and the souls you are leading into green pastures. Tell the boys for me that I know what the sweet, abiding love of Jesus is, and if they want a contented, beautiful life and peaceful death to accept Jesus as their Saviour to-day and 'He will never leave nor forsake them.' This message from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast—and Jesus is everywhere." The nautical work conducted by Evangelist Cake is supported by voluntary contributions, and is wholly undenominational. Much good has already resulted and many hearts have been led to Christ.

A TRIBUTE TO LAWYERS.

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Titus 3: 13. Bring Zenas the lawyer.

THE profession of the law is here introduced, and within two days in the capital city 303 young men joined it, and at this season in various parts of the land other hundreds are taking their diplomas for that illustrious profession, and is it not appropriate that I address such young men from a moral and religious standpoint, as upon them are now rolling the responsibilities of that calling represented in the text by Zenas the lawyer.

This man of my text belonged to a profession in which are many ardent supporters of Christ and the Gospel. Among them, Blackstone, the great commentator on English law; and Wilberforce, the emancipator; and the late Benjamin F. Butler, Attorney-General of New York; and the late Charles Chauncey, the leader of the Philadelphia bar; and Chief-Justices Marshall and Tenterden, and Campbell, and Sir Thomas More, who died for the truth on the scaffold, saying to his amazed executioner: "Pluck up courage, man, and do your duty; my neck is very short; be careful, therefore, and do not strike awry."

Among the mightiest pleas that ever have been made by tongue of barrister, have been pleas in behalf of the Bible and Christianity—as when Daniel Webster stood in the Supreme Court at Washington, pleading in the famous Girard will case, denouncing any attempt to educate the people without giving them at the same time moral sentiment, as "low, ribald and vulgar deism and infidelity;" as when Samuel L. Southard, of New Jersey, the leader of the forum in his day, stood on the platform at Princeton College commencement, advocating the literary excellency of the Scriptures.

Yet, notwithstanding all the pleas which that profession has made in behalf of God, and the Church, and the Gospel, and the rights of man, there has come down through the generations among many people an absurd and wicked prejudice against it. So long ago as in the time of Oliver Cromwell, it was decided that lawyers might not enter the Parliament House as members, and they were called "Sons of Zeruiah." The learned Dr. Johnson wrote an epithet for one of them in these words:

God works wonders now and then,
Here lies a lawyer, an honest man!

Two hundred years ago, a treatise was issued with the title: "Doomsday Approaching with Thunder and Lightning for Lawyers." A prominent clergyman of the last century wrote in regard to that profession, these words: "There is a society of men among us bred up from their youth in the art of proving, according as they are paid, that white is black and black is white. For example: If my neighbor has a mind to my cow, he hires a lawyer to prove that he ought to have my cow from me. I must hire another lawyer to defend my right, it being against all rules of law that a man should speak for himself. In pleading they do not dwell upon the merits of the cause, but upon circumstances foreign thereto. For instance, they do not take the shortest method to know what title my adversary has to my cow, but whether the cow be red or black, her horns long or short, or the like." After that they adjourn the case from time to time, and in twenty years they come to an issue. This society likewise has a peculiar cant or jargon of their own, in which all their laws are written, and these they take especial care to multiply, whereby they have so confounded truth and falsehood that it will take twelve years to decide whether the field left to me by my ancestors for six generations belongs to me, or to one three hundred miles off."

I say these things to show you that there has been a prejudice going on down, against that profession, from generation to generation. I account for it on the ground that they compel men to pay debts that they do not want to pay, and that they arraign criminals who want to escape the consequences of their crime; and as long as that is so, and it always will be so, just so long there will be classes of men who will affect, at any rate, to despise the legal profession. There are in that occupation, as in all our occupations, men utterly obnoxious to God and man; but if I were on trial for my integrity or my life, and I wanted even-handed justice administered to me, I would rather have my case submitted to a jury of twelve lawyers than to a jury of twelve clergymen. The legal profession, I believe, have less violence of prejudice than is to be found in the sacred calling.

There is, however, no man who has more temptations or graver responsibilities than the barrister, and he who attempts to discharge the duties of his position with only earthly resources, is making a very great mistake. Witness the scores of men who have in that profession made eternal shipwreck. Witness the men who, with the law of the land under their arm, have violated every statute of the eternal God. Witness the men who have argued placidly before earthly tribunals, who shall shiver in dismay before the Judge of quick and dead. Witness Lord Thurlow, announcing his loyalty to earthly government in the sentence: "If I forget my earthly sovereign, may God forget me," and yet stooping to unaccountable meannesses. Witness Lord Coke, the learned and the reckless. Witness Sir George McKenzie, the execrated of all Scotch Covenanters, so that until this day, in Gray Friars' Churchyard, Edinburgh, the children whistle through the bars of the tomb, crying:

Bloody Mackenzie, come out if you daur,
Lift the sneck, and draw the bar.

No other profession more needs the grace of God to deliver them in their temptations, to comfort them in their trials, to sustain them in the discharge of their duty. While I would have you bring the merchant to Christ, and while I would have you bring the farmer to Christ, and while I would have you bring the mechanic to Christ, I address you now in the words of Paul to Titus: "Bring Zenas the lawyer." By so much as his duties are delicate, and great, by so much does he need Christian stimulus and safeguard.

But how is an attorney to decide as to what are the principles by which he should conduct himself in regard to his clients? On one extreme, Lord Brougham will appear, saying: "The innocence or guilt of your client is nothing to you. You are to save your client regardless of the torment, the suffering, the destruction of all others. You are to know but one man in the world—your client. You are to save him though you should bring your country into confusion. At all hazards you must save your client." So says Lord Brougham. But no right-minded lawyer could adopt that sentiment. On the other extreme, Cicero will come to you and say: "You must never plead the cause of a bad man," forgetful of the fact that the greatest villain on earth ought to have a fair trial and that an attorney cannot be judge and advocate at the same time. It was grand when Lord Erskine sacrificed his attorney-generalship for the sake of defending Thomas Paine in his publication of his book called "The Rights of Man," while, at the same time, he, the advocate, abhorred Thomas Paine's irreligious sentiments. Between these two opposite theories of what is right, what shall the attorney do? God alone can direct him.

To that chancery he must be appellant, and he will get an answer in an hour. Blessed is that attorney between whose office and the throne of God there is perpetual, reverential, and prayerful communication. That attorney will never make an irreparable mistake. True to the habits of your profession, you say: "Cite us some authority on the subject." "Well, I quote to you the decision of the Supreme Court of heaven: 'If any lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him.'"

What a scene is the office of a busy attorney! In addition to the men who come to you from right motives, bad men will come to you. They will offer you a large fee for counsel in the wrong direction. They want to know from you how they can escape from solemn marital obligation. They come to you wanting to know how they can fail advantageously for themselves. They come to you wanting to know how they can make the insurance company pay for a destroyed house which they burned down with their own hands. Or they come to you on the simple errand of wanting to escape payment of their honest debts. Now, it is no easy thing to advise settlement, when by urging litigation you could strike a mine of remuneration. It is not a very easy thing to dampen the ardor of an inflamed contestant, when you know through a prolonged lawsuit you could get from him whatever you asked. Under the tremendous temptations that come upon the legal profession, there are scores of men who have gone down, and some of them from being the pride of the highest tribunal of the State, have become a disgrace to the Tombs court-room. Every attorney, in addition to the innate sense of right, wants the sustaining power of the old-fashioned religion of Jesus Christ. "Bring Zenas the lawyer."

There are two or three forms of temptation to which the legal profession is especially subject. The first of all is scepticism. Controversy is the life-time business of that occupation. Controversy may be incidental or accidental with us; but with you it is perpetual. You get so used to pushing the sharp question "Why?" and making unaided reason superior to the emotions, that the religion of Jesus Christ, which is a simple matter of faith, and above human reason, although not contrary to it, has but little chance with some of you. Oh, men of the legal profession, let me beg of you to quit asking questions in regard to religion, and begin believing. The mighty men of your profession, Story, and Kent, and Mansfield became Christians, not through their heads, but through their hearts. "Except ye become as a little child, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of God." If you do not become a Christian, O, man of the legal profession, until you can reason this whole thing out in regard to God, and Christ, and the immortality of the soul, you will never become a Christian at all. Only believe. "Bring Zenas the lawyer."

Another mighty temptation for the legal profession is to Sabbath breaking. The trial has been going on for ten or fifteen days. The evidence is all in. It is Saturday night. The judge's gavel falls on the desk, and he says: "Crier, adjourn the court until ten o'clock Monday morning." On Monday morning the counsellor is to sum up the case. Thousands of dollars, yea, the reputation and life of his client may depend upon the success of his plea. How will he spend the intervening Sunday? There is not one lawyer out of a hundred that can withstand the temptation to break the Lord's day under such circumstances. And yet, if he does, he hurts his own soul. What, my brother, you cannot do before twelve o'clock Saturday night, or after twelve o'clock Sunday night, God does not want you to do at all. Besides that, you want the twenty-four hours of Sabbath rest to give you that electrical and magnetic force which will be worth more to you before the jury than all the elaboration of your case on the sacred day. Every lawyer is entitled to one day's rest out of seven. If he surrenders that, he robs three—God, his own soul, and his client. Lord Castlereagh and Sir Thomas Romilly were the leaders of the bar in their day. They both died suicides. Wilberforce accounts for their aberration of intellect on the ground that they were unintermittent in their work, and they never rested on Sunday. "Poor fellow!" said Wilberforce, in regard to Castlereagh, "Poor fellow! it was non-observance of Sabbath." Chief-Justice Hale said: "When I do not properly keep the day, all the rest of the week is unsuccessful in my worldly management." Observance of the law of God, not only spiritually and eternally pays in hard dollars, or bank bill.

Another powerful temptation of the legal profession is to artificial stimulation except those who have a audiences knows about the nervous exhaustion that sometimes comes at the temptation to strong drink at the legal profession at that vein. Then, a trial is coming on. The ill-ventilated court-room, the bad health has been depressed for several weeks. He wants to rally his spirits. He is tempted to resort to artificial stimulants. It is either to get himself up himself down, that this temptation upon him. The flower of the bar, ruined in reputation and estate, said in his last moments: "The end. I am dying on a borrowed sheet, covered with a borrowed sheet, built by public charity. Bury me that tree in the middle of the field, may not be crowded; I always have been crowded."

Another powerful temptation of the legal profession is to allow the duties of the profession to be thoughts of the great future. Very well that you who have so many others, will after awhile be put yourselves. Death will serve as writ of ejectment, and you will be these earthly premises. On that the affairs of your life will be pre- a "bill of particulars." No man from a higher court, for this is the court. The day when Lord Exmouth tried for high treason; the day when the House of Commons moved for the impeachment of Lord Lovat; the day when Charles I. and Queen Caroline were upon trial; the day when Robert was arraigned as an insurgent; when Blennerhasset was brought to court-room because he had tried to throw the United States Government all the other great trials of the world nothing compared with the great trial which you and I shall appear, Sunday before the Judge of quick and dead. There will be no pleading the statute of limitations; no "turning evidence," trying to get off ourselves; others suffer; no "moving for a new trial." The case will come on inexorably and shall be tried. You, my brother, have so often been advocate for will then need an advocate for have you selected him? If you are a sinner, we have an Advocate—Jesus the righteous. It is uncertain who case will be called on. "Be ye also ready."

Lord Ashburton and Mr. Wall leading barristers in their day died about the same time. A few before their decease they happened in the same hotel in a village, the counsel going to Devonshire, the other going to London. They had been seized upon by a disease which would be fatal, and they requested they be carried into the same room laid down on sofas, side by side, to might talk over old times and the future. So they were carried, lying there on opposite sofas, the over their old contests at the table, then they talked of the future which they must soon enter. It was to have been a very affecting and interesting interview between Mr. Wallace Ashburton. My subject to-day is side by side with those men in the profession who have departed this life of them sceptical and rebellious men penitent, childlike, and Christian. Those were wandering stars, for reserved the blackness of darkness ever, while these others went up to court-room of earth to the throne of dominion. Through Christ, these got glorious acquittal; the other case, it was a hopeless case. An unpardoned sinner versus the God Almighty. Oh, what disaster! Behold, he comes! The Judge! the clouds of heaven roll back. The great white throne of judgment. The archangel's voice shall wake the dead; the crier: ye blessed—depart ye cursed, ye quittal or the condemnation. I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God, and the books were opened.

A CRYING GOSPEL FIELD.

ated of Evangelical Work among the Indians of Peru and Bolivia—A Dark Nook of "the Neglected Continent"—Dr. Wood's Missionary Tour.

THAT South America truly deserves the title of "the Neglected Continent" in a spiritual and educational way every passing year more thoroughly proves. Protestant missions have comparatively slow progress there, the dense ignorance and superstition a very large proportion of the population—conditions fostered and encouraged by the Romanists, who have held the religious and to a large extent the material destinies of the country for generations.

REV. DR. THOMAS B. WOOD.
DIRECTOR OF THE MISSIONS IN PERU.

We print a most interesting letter from J. M. Spangler, a missionary in which he sets forth in graphic terms the conditions of the Indians of Bolivia, whom the missionaries are endeavoring to evangelize, with the aid and support of friends in the States. This new, most attractive and worthy work is prospering, and deserves the warmest cooperation of all friends at home and abroad to aid in the spread of the Gospel of Jesus among the uncivilized races of the world.

CALLAO, PERU, May 10. The mountain regions of Peru, far from the thoroughness of higher civilization, are a tree million of Indians, in a measure the descendants of those conquered by Pizarro. Taken as a whole, they are perhaps the most backward, easily governed, and industrious. They toil—old and young, male and female—almost incessantly. They live in every nook and corner of the land, producing crops on almost inaccessible and almost an honest living under conditions wherein a white man probably fail.

The women go to and from their fields, knitting in hand, at all times, and at all hours, and at all times. A woman will work all day at hoeing corn, or threshing the harvest, or weaving, knitting, or spinning, or else she knows how to do, for a small sum of ten cents in American money, and the highest wages a man receives rarely ever exceeds twenty cents. These people produce wheat, corn, potatoes, apples, pine apples, raisins, chickens, llamas, vicuñas, and a few cattle and horses. They manufacture woolen cloth, blankets, shoes, hats, pottery, and other articles of commerce. Were they well conducted an honest administration of law and justice: were they well guided by honest teachers; had they anything like the opportunities higher civilization affords men, they would in all respects not doubt rival the Anglo-Americans.

The Indians are sadly misgoverned! The peace, placed over them as a substitute of law and order, often abuse them, and are said to shamefully rob them. White men have been allowed to sell them strong drink at enormous profits, with the result that a large number of these noble people have become drunken and degraded. The priests, at least in some districts, collect tithings upon everything produced, while there is no law to warrant such taxation. And more: if an Indian has a sick horse, or a sick donkey, or a sick child, or any bad luck, or any ailment of whatever nature, the priest is sure to put in an appearance; and for the consideration of a live sheep, or a vicuña, or something else of commercial value—even for a sheep skin, when he cannot get more—he will mumble meaningless Latin words to cure the disease, or stay the evil. When the Rev. Dr. Chas. W. Drees was passing through Bolivia, he saw a priest sprinkling the Indians with so-called holy water, at the rate of twenty-five cents for each one sprinkled. The priest, on beholding the doctor, gave him a sly wink, as much as to say, "I quite agree with you, my dear sir, that this is a fraud, but kindly keep quiet while I dupe these ignorant people and get their money."

The surface of these mountain regions is of the most wonderful description. After the table-lands of Thibet, these of which I write are the highest in the world. But, unlike those of Thibet, these are studded over with towns and villages having an altitude of from ten thousand to fifteen thousand feet. Lying within the tropics, the climate is temperate and delightful. All sorts of cereals and vegetables are produced in abundance.

The city of Cuzco is situated in a region of rare natural beauty, and enjoys a temperate climate at an elevation of 10,380 feet. Here, before Pizarro came with his Spanish cruelty, lived and reigned the Incas—the kindest and the noblest fathers these highlanders have ever known. After centuries of prodigious labor they perfected a remarkable system of agriculture. Not only was the fertile soil cultivated with great care, but the sandy wastes of ductive fields and rich pasture lands; and the whole coast teemed with a happy, industrious people.

All of this, however, has been destroyed. In the valley of Santa there once dwelt seven hundred thousand prosperous people; now it scarcely supports ten thousand. In the valley of Acullama there were once thirty thousand; now there are only three hundred or four hundred inhabitants.

Evolution in this instance has worked backward. A great government was destroyed and a poorer one supplanted it; and the same is probably true in matters of religion. For under the Incas, the Indians were taught to believe in a Great Spirit, the Creator of the universe, who could not be represented by any image or symbol. They also believed in the resurrection of the dead. But now they are taught to believe in the pope as the viceroy of the Almighty, in the Virgin Mary, and in numerous wooden images. It is true that these Indians formerly worshipped the sun as a secondary deity, and that throughout the land altars smoked with offerings in sun-worship; but now they worship Mary, and they have in their homes, in their churches, and in many other places, public and private, a great array of images, held sacred and bowed down to by all; and on special occasions processions of men, women, and children with uncovered heads and every attitude of reverence and devotion, follow some great images of wood, from which they implore blessings, while the air is made sickening with the fumes of incense. Dr. Wood has recently visited the high-

Gospel Wagon Mission.

Gospel Wagons have now been used in city and country, for street services for several years and are regarded by Christian workers as a success in soul-saving. A new departure has been made by Rev. A. S. Orne of Syracuse, N. Y., who after a year's trial declares he believes it to be one of the secrets of success in the modern missionary movement. Mr. Orne and family left Haverhill, Mass., on May 23d, traveling through Massachusetts, Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, District of Columbia, and arriving in Virginia in November, where they spent 4 months. Every class and condition of humanity were thus reached from the humble home in the country to the residents at the national capital as well as to prisons and poor-houses, saloons and school-houses, railroad yards, brick yards, hop and harvest fields, state and county fairs, circuses, canals and summer resorts. Hundreds of religious papers including THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and many others, and also thousands of tracts were placed in the hands of eager readers.

A GROUP OF HALF-BREED PERUVIAN INDIAN GIRLS IN HOLIDAY ATTIRE.

the coast—never visited by rains, and only scantily watered by mountain streams—were made to blossom as the rose, by means of a system of irrigation the most stupendous the world has ever seen. Water was collected in lakes among the mountains, and led down the slopes, by canals and subterranean passages constructed on a vast scale, to sandy wastes which apparently had been doomed to sterility. The ruins of this vast system, as seen at this present day grandly testify to the industry, the ingenuity, and the patience of a great people. Their aqueducts were sometimes four hundred and five hundred miles long. They were tunneled through massive rocks, and carried across rivers, ravines, and marshy wastes of land. They were constructed of large slabs of stone, fitted so perfectly as to require no cement. And by means of these waterways large tracts of sandy wastes were converted into pro-lands of Peru, where he explained the doctrines of the Bible every night for a week in one of the principle centres. The priest were furious, and did everything they could to prevent him, but in vain. The meetings were well attended and the people were anxious to receive instructions. The Doctor also visited La Paz, the Capital of Bolivia. It is his opinion that these great fields can, with prudence, now be occupied. He is training some very faithful, native, local preachers here in Callao, who, whenever the money is forthcoming for their support will be sent to preach the Gospel to these highlanders.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its progress, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or letters for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Paul and the Philippian Jailer.

Sunday School Lesson for July 11. Acts 16: 22-34. Golden Text: Acts 16: 31.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

THE house of Lydia had become the little commencement of the Church at Philippi, but Lydia's family and her guests still went to "the place of prayer" (Acts 16: 16, R. V.), by the river-side, where probably other inquirers were to be met with and led to the Lord. A certain maid having a spirit, a Python (R. V., literally a soothsaying demon), met them. Just as in the present day in China, India, and Africa, such a one brought her master gain by soothsaying. The medicine men of heathen Africa, the fakirs of India, as well as many who exercise sorcery in Asia and the adjacent countries, gain much money from the people who in their superstition and fear come to them in sickness and trouble.

The poor girl followed after Paul and his company, crying: "These men are the servants of the Most High God, which show unto us the way of salvation. And this did she many days." The evil spirits which came out of many in the time of our Lord, knew him: "Devils also came out of many crying out and saying: 'Thou art Christ the Son of God.'" And he, rebuking, suffered them not to speak, for they knew that he was Christ. (Luke 4: 41.) The Lord Jesus could dispense with such witnesses, and so could Paul, and yet this "Apostle of the Gentiles," was in no hurry to rid himself of this embarrassment; he waited till all was ripe; and many days passed by during which this same strange witness drew the attention of men to the servants of God. Thus the work of God became advertised in Philippi, and the way made for its further conquests. What the Lord may have taught Paul during these days of waiting, or how he could have understood his Lord who had so often been in the same position, we can only know as we ourselves are privileged to enter into fellowship with his sufferings. That beings created for the very purpose of being indwelt by God should become the obedient and helpless instruments of demons, serving them as their voices, expressing in their features and in their gestures the character of these lost spirits must have been a deep grief to the Master. At last the moment was come when Paul was free in his God to go forward. One day, he "being grieved turned and said to the spirit: I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her." And he came out the same hour.

The demon was cast out, but her masters saw all their earthly hopes blighted. Gain was their great end; it was little matter to them that the spirit which possessed the poor girl was an evil spirit, and that she was tormented by it, but they must have their gain whoever might be the sufferer. These men easily persuaded the magistrates and the multitude that these foreigners, Paul and Silas were dangerous to their city; and without any trial or semblance of justice, the magistrates rent off their clothes and gave command to beat them. After this they handed them over to the jailer, who, following in the wake of the magistrates and people, treated them with the utmost severity. How gladly would Satan have extinguished the smoking flax of this little infant church at Philippi! But Paul, seeing things in the light of the Holy Spirit who possessed him, saw his God permitting all, and believed from his heart that all things were working together for good to him and to his companion who loved God (Rom. 8: 28), and that the Church which God had used him to plant would not be rooted up.

How should men of faith act in such circumstances? When a man of faith has his eyes on God all things take a different color. It was under no tremendous strain of will, but simply the natural outflow of hearts filled by God with joy, even at such an hour, that Paul and Silas "prayed and sang praises to God." Wakened up from their sleep by prayer and praise—unusual sounds where oaths and curses, bitter and angry words were wont to reign—the prisoners were astonished. And how much more so when the walls began to rock, the earthen floor of the dungeon heaved, every bolt fell back, every door was opened, and the galling chains under which they had groaned fell clanking to the ground! What had caused such a subversion? God had heard the prayers of two men who trusted in him! This God then was true. Irrefutable proof that their God lived!

The last to awake in the prison that night was the jailer. The prayer and the praises had not reached his ear, but he saw the open doors and the fallen chains, and that he had lost all his power over his prisoners. Only disgrace and death awaited him by the law if his prisoners should escape. Dishonor was worse than death to him; and he drew his sword to commit suicide. But the very man on whom magistrates and people had heaped scourging reproach and imprisonment, whom he himself had treated with barbarous severity, cried out: "Do thyself no harm, for we are all here." This was an earthquake more tremendous in its results than that which had opened the prison doors. The jailer beheld, for the first time in his life, a man who loved his enemies, and who returned good for evil. He saw, in fact the Christ of God dwelling in his servant, Paul, and all the foundations of the man's being shook as those of the prison had shaken. Calling for a light he sprang in, and trembling before his prisoners, he fell down before them; yes, before God in them. Then he himself, forgetting his terror at being found untrue to his charge, brought them out, and from his awakened heart cried out, "Sirs, what must I do to be saved?" "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved and thy house." Was this all? Yes; truly, for an awakened conscience; for real faith lets God into the soul. And the jailer's house became a praying-place and these prisoners, preachers of the Word of the Lord, and the night which followed the day of persecution and suffering was turned into day by the light which came into many souls.

At midnight the cry of the awakened jailer went up, and the same hour of the night many things happened; he took them and washed their stripes; and now the life which he had been ready to sacrifice to his pride before was laid on the altar of his God. He was baptized, he and all his straightway; so confessing him who had bought him with his blood. After this Paul and Silas could eat, while the new converts, including perhaps even all the prisoners, for we read of none of them that they escaped, rejoiced believing in God. Thus the enemy was worsted, and the Church in Philippi largely augmented by the very circumstances which threatened to be detrimental to it.

Had the news of what had happened reached the magistrates? Probably this was the cause that they sent to the jailer, not to execute him for failing to keep his prisoners securely, but with the command to let them go. But now it was Paul's turn to show the very men who had charged him with unlawful conduct that it was they, and not he, who had broken the law. They have beaten us openly and uncondemned, being Romans, have cast us into prison, and now do they thrust us out privily? Nay verily, but let them come themselves and fetch us out. And God ordered that it should be even so. And thus the populace which had been so excited against them but yesterday, had the public proof that the magistrates had been in the wrong. Thus reproach was diverted from the Christians.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE good work so hopefully begun at Philippi by the conversion of Lydia, was suddenly and unexpectedly interrupted, and the pity of it was that an act of Christian compassion should have been the cause. One of those wretched creatures known to the people of that day as a demoniac, had been following Paul and his companions about the streets, attracting public attention to them by her cries. She appears to have been of the type mentioned in the Gospels, specimens of which Jesus cured. She had fallen into the hands of unscrupulous men, who made a livelihood out of her affliction. Why she followed Paul is not stated, but she persistently acclaimed him a servant of God. At last, being weary of the annoy-

"Thrust them into the inner prison and made their feet fast in the stocks."

ance and being sorry for the girl, he miraculously cured her, and as she could then be of no further use to her employers, they held themselves aggrieved. There was probably no remedy for their grievance under the Roman law, but it was easy to incite a popular tumult against foreign Jews. They availed themselves of the common prejudice, and the rulers, supposing them to be common disturbers of the peace, stripped them and ordered them to be publicly beaten, apparently giving them no opportunity of defence. After this they were sent to prison. The jailer receiving special orders to keep them safely, put them in the inner prison, usually a horrible pestilential hole where there was neither good air nor light. Paul and Silas, smarting with their beating, were subjected to this cruel treatment. Their spirits, however, were not depressed. They spent the night in prayer and praise, to the evident astonishment of the other prisoners, who probably had never witnessed such conduct in prisoners before. While this was going on, came the earthquake, the doors of the prison opened, and the fastenings of the prisoners were loosed. The jailer awakened by the earthquake and seeing the prisoners unbound, would have killed himself, knowing that it was a capital offence on the part of a jailer to lose his prisoners. But Paul reassured him as to that danger. But the jailer was concerned about another matter. He wanted to know what he must do to be saved. It was difficult to understand his putting the question. Possibly the cries of the epileptic girl may have suggested it. Certainly it was his eternal safety that was inquiring about, and Paul gave the answer which has been the many a sermon since that time. The answer was brief and to the point. Paul supplemented it with further explanation. The jailer believed and gave of his sincerity, by trying to undo the mischief that had been done. It is always a good sign. He took the prisoners and washed their lacerated bodies. If he was concerned as to giving account to his superiors of this kind of charging them. Possibly the rule not being beyond superstition alarmed by the earthquake. But he would not accept of the release tendered. He felt the humiliation beating keenly, and indeed he never got it. Writing long afterwards of the time, he said he was shamefully at Philippi (1. Thess. 2: 2.) Some action he could have and he insisted on it. The rulers terrified at what had been done—knowing that to beat a Roman at all was an unpardonable offence and to imprison him without a trial was still worse—were anxious to appease them and prevent their appeal to Rome for redress. Paul accepted the humiliation as an apology and a brief farewell visit to Lydia and

Timothy he left the city. It would appear that Luke probably Timothy rebehind to continue the work for in the further story of the prison, Luke resumes the pronoun "they" of "we," and speaks of "us," and Silas as if the prison. Thus the first step was to hear the reward of those who brought the life-giving message with ill-usage.

All the doors were and every one's bands loosened. Some doubt has been expressed as to whether it was possible for an earthquake to have this effect. Probably, however, witness such results from an earthquake in 1881, while on a tour in Asiatic Turkey. The mode of securing doors was by a bar or staples which were in the doorposts. When an earthquake came, the posts fell apart, the staples to the ground and the doors opened. More than that earthquake so shook the stones were loosened, and the staples to the prisoners were loosened, and the prisoners were freed.

What must I do to be saved? Moody tells the story of a miller who was rowing down the stream when his mill turned his mill. The night was dark and the man tired. He let the boat drift and fell asleep. He was awakened by the roar of the water rushing over the mill-dam. In an instant he realized the peril of his position, and seizing the oars he began to pull for his life against the current. He knew full well that if he over that dam, it was sure and instant destruction. So he tried to swing toward the shore, but nearer and nearer he went to the dam. At last, in a mighty effort he got alongside the dam and rocky bank. He caught a twig and held it up for dear life. He tried to loosen and he desisted, but the twig and while he clung to it the boat was being carried toward the dam. He shouted loudly, "Help! Help!" He then heard a response and a rope lowered to him from the top of the dam. Should he let go the twig which kept him from death and seize the rope? He depended on whether he believed the man who held the rope. He was staking his life on his belief. But he did not hesitate; he seized the rope and drew up. "Now that is what I say, loose everything else and trust to God!"

MISSIONARIES IN COUNCIL.

Annual Reunion at Clifton Springs, N. Y., of Missionaries on Furlough of many Nationalities and Retired Veterans for Conference and Social Intercourse.

ONE of the most interesting and impressive gatherings of the year is that of the International Missionary Union, which has of late made its rendezvous at Clifton Springs, N. Y. Four of these reunions have taken place, each becomes more representative and more delightful than its predecessors. The object of the Union is to bring into communication, and once a year into personal association, missionaries of many nationalities and of different denominations, to unite with them the veterans who have returned from the spheres of labor to spend their declining years in a restful land. To men and women who have the missionary spirit and have dedicated their lives to the missionary cause, these annual reunions are seasons of joy and communion. Here they meet and are like-minded with themselves and with the most blissful of all relations, the companionship of kindred spirits. It

Mrs. Henry Foster, too, are entitled to the thanks of the Christian world for the splendid hospitality which gives free and generous welcome year by year to these honored guests, whose presence is a benediction to their home.

This year one hundred and fifty-five missionaries accepted the annual invitation to the reunion. Representatives of twenty-five nationalities and twenty-one missionary societies were in the gathering, showing how the love of Christ and enthusiasm in his service overleap all lines of separation and produce a common brotherhood in his name. In this gathering, differences of nationality and of sect are forgotten, and brother hails as brother the Christian missionary whose work is a common bond of endearment. For one week—from June 9th to 15th—they were in constant and harmonious association, listening to papers on missionary topics, reports of progress in various fields, and discussing the questions and problems arising in fields of missionary service.

and Dr. Bartlett, of Smyrna of the American Board, long resident in Turkey, threw much light on the Turkish question. Dr. G. W. Wood began his mission work in 1838 at Singapore, and at Constantinople in 1842. Afterwards Dr. Wood was a Secretary of the American Board. Dr. Gulick belongs to the historic Gulick family of Hawaii, but Dr. Gulick was himself for twenty-one years a missionary in Spain. Rev. J. K. Wight belonged to the American Presbyterian Mission in China. Mr. Higgins is about sailing for the Baptist Telegu Mission in India. Rev. E. S. Booth belongs to the Japan Mission of the Dutch Reformed Church. Miss Sites is the daughter of the late Nathan Sites of the M. E. Mission in Foochow, China. Miss Thayer is the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. C. C. Thayer, formerly of Turkey. Dr. Merritt was a medical missionary of the American Board in China. Mrs. Belden is the widow of Rev. W. H. Belden, the late Secretary of the International Missionary Union. Ding Ming Wong, of Foochow, was a delegate, representing the Christian students of China, on his way to the "World's Federation of Students," at Northfield. Mr. Waldemeier belongs to the Friends. He

A Brave Prelate.

THE death of Lord Plunkett, Archbishop of Dublin, is a matter of interest to Christian people of other lands and other communions than his own.

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP PLUNKETT.

His sturdy Protestantism, his valorous defence of the truth and his manly sympathy with the persecuted and oppressed endeared him to Christian people all over the world. He was not a scholar and was indifferent to the erudition which is the pride of so many of his brethren on the Episcopal bench, but like his great Master, the apostle of the Gentiles, he preached Christ crucified and gloried in the Cross. Through-and inspiration, too, to look over the faces of men and women whose names are high in the annals of the missionary cause. Men and women who have given their best years to the toil of the service in foreign lands, and are now only waiting the call of their Master to receive their reward in his presence. The younger men, fresh from the field, and the veterans, weary with labor in the field, are inspired by meeting and hearing from the stories of their struggles and triumphs. Dr. J. T. Gracey, who has been a part of the movement, could not have more kindly and thoughtful things to say to the men and women who are engaged in the work. The encouragement they give and the impetus they impart and the holy unction they are the means of bringing from the Source of all grace, are felt for years afterward in the hearts of the missionaries in Africa, Asia, and the Southern Seas. The picture on this page is a photograph of this interesting assemblage, taken at the recent meeting. It is almost invidious to mention a few names out of so many which are deservedly honored in the churches, but a few conspicuous in the picture may be formally introduced to our readers.

Dr. Cyrus Hamlin, who began his missionary life in Turkey sixty years ago, and was the founder of Robert College at Constantinople, was the Nestor of the convention. He was always heard with the greatest interest and attention. His intimate knowledge of Turks, Armenians and other orientals of the Moslem empire, with his keen intellect, makes him an authority among writers and speakers of this country on the "Eastern Question." Dr. Parmelee was an eye-witness of the massacre of the Armenians at Trebizond, and gave to the convention a graphic account of the horror. Dr. Farnsworth, of Cesarea, has labored for nearly forty years in Abyssinia and Syria. Mr. Waldemeier is a native Syrian. There were also present the Misses Abe and Sudo, Japanese ladies, who have recently taken their degrees of M.D., and are soon to go back to Japan as medical missionaries. No less than eighty of the men and women whose portraits are in this picture are leaving for foreign lands, and at the closing meeting of the Union, Dr. Hamlin gave them a special benediction and farewell.

THE BIBLE CONFERENCE.

The twenty-first annual meeting of the Niagara Bible Conference for Bible study will be held at Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ontario, Canada, for seven days, beginning July 7th. All the sessions are devoted to study, with devotional meetings. The subjects this year are the Minor Prophets and Paul's Letter to the Churches. Other subjects will pertain to the enlargement of Christian life and to world-wide evangelism. The following teachers will be present: Dis. Erdman, Goodwin and Parsons, Professors Moorehead and Streeter, and Messrs. Howard, Needham and others.

out his life he was identified with the Evangelical party in the church and showed cordial liking for men of other denominations who were preaching the pure Gospel. Born in 1828, he early devoted himself to the service of Christ. For twenty years after his ordination, he was a plain country clergyman, laboring zealously in the ordinary clerical duties of his parish. The confusion which followed the disestablishment of his church in 1869 placed Protestantism in Ireland in peril, and it was mainly through Plunkett's efforts that the cause was saved. He became Bishop of Meath, and was afterwards raised to the Archbishopric of Dublin. In this capacity he incurred the condemnation of the Romanizing party in the church by consecrating Cabrera the Protestant champion in Spain, as a Bishop. Whether Plunkett exceeded his powers is still a question in dispute, among those who are sticklers for the Apostolic Succession.

Where to Go.

THE question is coming up in many households as to the best mode of vacation. We shall all need rest. The first thing to do is to measure the length of your purse; you cannot make a short purse reach around Saratoga and the White Mountains. There may be as much health, good cheer and recuperation in a country farm-house where the cows come up every night and yield milk without any chalk in it. What the people of our cities need is quiet. What the people of the country need is sight-seeing. Let the mountains come to New York and New York go to the mountains. The nearest we ever get to heaven in this world is lying flat down on our back under a tree, looking up through the branches, five miles off from a post-office or a telegraph station. But this would be torture to others. Independent of what others do or say, let us in the selection of summer recreations study our own temperament and finances. It does not pay to spend so much money in July and August that you have to get pinched and half-clad the rest of the year. The healthiest recreations do not cost much. In boyhood, with a string and a crooked pin attached to it, we fished up more fun from the mill-pond than one summer with a fifteen-dollar apparatus we caught among the Franconia Mountains. There is a great area of enjoyment within the circumference of one dollar if you only know how to make the circuit. More depends upon ourselves than upon the affluence of our surroundings. If you are compelled to stay at home all summer, you may be as happy as though you went away. The enjoyment of the first of August, when we go off, is surpassed by nothing but the first of September, when we come home.

God in the Home.

THE first thing to do with a lamb is to put it in the arms of the Great Shepherd. Of course we must observe natural laws. Give a child excessive meat diet and it will grow unsound; catechism three times a day, and sixty grains in each dose will prevent it. Talk much in your child's presence about the fashions, and it will be fond of dress, notwithstanding all your lectures on humility. Fill your house with gossip, and your children will tattler. Culture them as much as you will, but give them plenty of money to spend, and they will go to destruction.

But while we are to use common sense in every direction respecting a child, the first thing is to strive for its conversion, and there is nothing more potent than family prayers. Your son may go to the ends of the earth, and run through the whole catalogue of transgressions, but he will remember the family altar, and it will be a check, and a call, and perhaps his redemption.

Family prayers are often of no use. Perhaps they are too hurried. We have so much before us of the day's work, that we hustle the children together. We get half through the chapter before the family are seated. We read as if we were reading for a wager. We drop on our knees, and are in the second or third sentence before they all get down. It is an express train, with amen for the first depot. We rush for the hat and overcoat, and are on the way to the store, leaving the impression that family prayers are a necessary nuisance, and we had better not have had any gathering of the family at all. Better have given them a kiss all around; it would have taken less time, and would have been more acceptable to God and them.

Family prayers often fail in adaptedness. Do not read for the morning lesson a genealogical chapter, or about Samson's setting the foxes' tails on fire. For all the good your children get from such reading you might as well have read a Chinese almanac. Rather give the story of Jesus and the children climbing into his arms, or the lad with the loaves and fishes, or the sea of Galilee dropping to sleep under Christ's lullaby. Stop and ask questions. Make the exercise so interesting that little Johnny will stop playing with his shoestrings, and Jenny will quit rubbing the cat's fur the wrong way. Let the prayer be pointed, and made up of small words, and no wise information to the Lord about things he knows without your telling him. Let the children feel they are prayed for. Have a hymn if any of you can sing. Let the season be spirited, appropriate, and gladly solemn.

Family prayer also fails when the whole day is not in harmony with it. A family prayer, to be worth anything, ought to be twenty-four hours long. It ought to give the pitch to all the day's work and behavior. The day when we get thoroughly mad, upsets the morning devotion. The life must be in the same key with the devotion.

Right Side and Wrong Side.

THERE are many persons who from childhood, while they may not be at all petulant, yet show a sad and melancholy turn of mind which seems ineradicable. Although their lot may be comfortable, they have, all their life long, the appearance of having met with afflictions. Others from infancy are light and happy. They romp, they fly. You can hear their swift feet in the hall. Their loud laughter rings through the house, or in the woods bursts into a score of echoes. At night you can hardly hush their glad hearts for slumber, and in the morning they wake you with their singing. Alas! if they leave you, and wake you no more in the morning with their sweet song; if the color go out of the rose, and its leaves fall; if angels for once grow jealous, and want what you cannot spare; if packed away in the trunk or drawer there be silent garments that once fluttered with youthful life, and by mistake you call some other child by the name of the one departed! Ah me! Ah me!

Like most garments, like most carpets, everything in life has a right side and a wrong side. You can take any joy, and by turning it around, find troubles on the other side; or you may take the greatest trouble, and by turning it around, find joys on the other side. The gloomiest mountain never casts a shadow on both sides at once, nor does the greatest of life's calamities. The earth, in its revolutions, manages about right; it never has darkness all over at the same time. Sometimes it has night in America, and sometimes in China; but there is some part of the earth constantly in the bright sunlight.

The Bondage of Debt.

SOCIETY slaughters a great many young men by the behest. "You must keep up appearances; whatever be your salary you must dress as well as others; you must take wine and brandy as many friends, you must smoke as costly cigars, you must give as expensive entertainments, and you must live in as fashionable a boarding-house. If you haven't the money, borrow. If you can't borrow, make a false entry, or subtract here a bill from a bundle of bank-bills; you will only have to make the deception a little while; in a few months, or in a year or two, you can make all right. Nobody will be hurt by it; nobody will be the wiser. You yourself will not be damaged." By this awful process a hundred thousand men have been slaughtered for time and slaughtered for eternity.

Suppose you borrow. There is nothing wrong about borrowing money. There is hardly a man but has sometimes borrowed money. Vast estates have been built on a borrowed dollar. But there are two kinds of borrowed money. Money borrowed for the purpose of starting or keeping up legitimate enterprise and expense, and money borrowed to get that which you can do without. The first is right, the other is wrong.

The Bible distinctly says the borrower is the servant of the lender. It is a bad state when you have to go down some other street to escape meeting some one whom you owe. If young men knew what is the despotism of being in debt, more of them would keep out of it.

Death's Terrors.

WITH many of us it is a bright, sunny day of prosperity. There is not a cloud in the sky, not a leaf rustling in the forest. No chill in the air. But we cannot expect all this to last. He is not an intelligent man who expects perpetual daylight of joy. The sun will after awhile near the horizon. The shadows will lengthen. I have heard it said that we ought to live as though each moment were to be our last. I do not believe that theory. As far as preparation is concerned, we ought always to be ready; but we cannot always be thinking of death, for we have duties in life that demand our attention. When a man is selling goods, it is his duty to think of the bargain he is making. When a man is pleading in the courts it is his duty to think of the interests of his clients. When a clerk is adding up accounts it is his duty to keep his mind upon the columns of figures. He who fills up his life with thoughts of death is far from being the highest style of Christian. But there are times when we can and ought to give ourselves to the contemplation of that solemn moment when the soul time ends and eternity begins. This ought not to be a depressing theme.

On earth with many of you the evening is the happiest of the twenty-four hours. You gather about the hearth. You talk and laugh and sing. You recount the day. You plan for the morrow. You have games and repartees. Amid all the toil of the day, that is the goal for which you run, and as you take out your watch or look at the descending sun, you thrill with the thought that it is toward evening. So death comes to the disciple! What if the sun of life is about to set? Jesus is the day-spring from on high; the perpetual morning of every ransomed spirit. What if the darkness comes? Jesus is the light of the world and of heaven. What though this earthly house does crumble? Jesus has prepared a house of many mansions. Jesus is the fountain that is never exhausted. Jesus is the evening star hung up amid the gloom of the gathering night.

I can safely the accessions to the church should be in the history of this station; I hope that not fall short of five hundred. Some churches already doubled their membership."

Protestant churches in Madagascar are having a hard time under the domination of the French Government. The Jesuit priests are particularly active. A newspaper correspondent from the island, says that he has seen four churches which for twenty years have been well attended. Three of the four are now empty, the natives being afraid to know that they are Protestants, as they charge Protestants with instigating rebellion. The fourth church the congregation was gathered to discuss a proposal to go over to the Roman Catholic faith in a body. The advocates of the frankly declared they had no wish to become Catholics, but as their pastor had been shot, the only way of saving their lives.

THE RECORD REIGN.

NEWS from the other side of the Atlantic for two weeks past has been mainly about the celebration of Queen Victoria's diamond jubilee, which appears to have attracted the attention of continental capitalists as much as her own. Every one has a distinguished representative in the celebration and personally attend the royal lady on the complete sixtieth year of her reign. Rivalries and animosities appear to have been laid aside for a time, to do the aged monarch, whose peregrinations have always been kindly received by other peoples and their rulers. Amid all the disputes and international complications of the past sixty years, Queen has so conducted herself in her position as to win general respect and sincere esteem. Her influence has been exercised on the side of peace and unity, and to any nation in trouble she has gone out in graceful fashion with a promptness and sincerity that won the public admiration. The result is seen in the cordiality with which foreign courts, which have no English policy, have joined in the celebration. But the most notable feature of the pageant was the rescue from the outlying sections of the empire. The variety of types of people attracted to the ceremony were practical evidences of the extent of British rule. From a compiled statement it appears that the British flag waves over an area of one-fifth of the globe, and that people who acknowledge fealty to her are more than one-fifth of the world's inhabitants. No nation in modern history approaches this rapid development, and it is what this landmark should be celebrated with considerable national enthusiasm. However, says that rumors are current in the past few weeks of Queen's age and infirmities have been upon her more heavily of late. She yearns for the rest and quietude which she cannot enjoy while she occupies the throne. A recent cablegram, which lacks authoritative confirmation, states that the celebration of last year will practically close the Queen's brilliant reign. It states that her Majesty has decided on abdication in favor of the Prince of Wales, and will spend the remainder of her life in retirement. No one would grudge her the well-deserved repose, though it must be said to her honor that her subjects would hear her step with genuine regret. Her reign has strengthened the tie between the British people and given the monarch a new lease of life. It would seem that if her heirs fulfil the conditions, the promise given to David may be fulfilled to the Queen:

Children will keep my covenant and my law, that I shall teach them, their children shall sit upon thy throne for evermore. (1 Sam. 13:14)

Antes of Uniforms.

Reports to the White House recently insisted to see a veteran usher who had his office through many administrations, wearing a uniform for the first time. It is common enough in the private homes of wealthy citizens to have the men and other servants clad in livery. In the White House, the ushers and sentries wore ordinary clothing. The change suggested the question, whether the new President was developing aristocratic tastes and aping the manners and customs of the European nobility. However, elicited the fact that a more practical reason was the basis of the change. Visitors from a distance are often embarrassed in the crowd at the Executive Mansion, not knowing how to reach the President, or the Private Secretary, or members of the clerical staff. Looking around for some one to whom to address an inquiry, it was difficult to ascertain who had the duty of directing the strangers. The idea of a conspicuous uniform to be worn by the officials was suggested and has been adopted. The result has been satisfactory. Visitors can now see at a glance who are officials, and can apply to them for guidance in reaching the President or members of the Executive staff. When an awakened soul wants to find the way to God, it is an advantage if his servants are so clearly recognizable that an inquiry may be put to them at once without hesitation and be promptly answered. The distinguishing mark of service in their case is not in the garments but in the life.

By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one to another. (John 13:35)

A Dog in a Dentist's Chair.

A dentist in New York had a patient that was difficult to manage, in his hands last week. One of the most famous dogs in the city, is a big St. Bernard of pure breed. He is a son of the illustrious dog who won the prize of five thousand dollars and promises to be as famous as his sire. Some few days ago he neglected his food and became sullen and irritable. These are always ominous symptoms in a dog as they are the first signs of rabies. His owner, a well-known dentist, was much concerned about the condition of his big pet, and called in a doctor. The examination of the animal revealed the cause of his indisposition. One of his great teeth was decayed. The dog evidently had the toothache and did not like it any more than human beings do. His owner felt equal to the task of dealing with that malady himself, so he took his pet with him in his carriage the next morning when he went to his office. His assistants held the dog in the chair, while the dentist applied his little whirling excavator. The dog was uneasy, but he submitted without protest until the drill struck the nerve, when with a fierce howl he shook himself free and jumped out of window to the pavement, twelve feet below. Before the dentist could reach the street, the dog was tearing wildly towards his home. The next morning when the carriage came, the dog hid himself under a lounge, but by dint of much coaxing and dragging he was gotten into the carriage and was led into the dental establishment. His master would not take any risks this time, so the dog was put under anæsthetics. The dentist worked on the tooth more at his ease and, before the animal recovered consciousness had the cavity filled with gold. The dog, on coming to himself, felt with his tongue for his aching tooth and was evidently perplexed by the strange sensation, but was apparently greatly relieved. He has resumed his usual meals and seems none the worse for his experience. It was natural for a dog to resist treatment for his cure, because the beneficent motive of his master could not be explained to him, but the Christian ought not to be restive when painful or disagreeable discipline is applied to him for the extirpation of the evil in his nature.

Happy is the man whom God correcteth: therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty: for he maketh sore and bindeth up: he woundeth and his hands make whole. (Job 5:17,18)

Strange False Pretences.

A French medical journal reports an extraordinary issue of a prosecution in Paris. The law in that country is very severe against men who practice medicine without proper qualifications. There are quack doctors there as elsewhere who sell patent medicines, and there is no law against their doing so, but the line is drawn at their writing prescriptions for patients. Recently the police commissary was notified that in an aristocratic quarter of the city a quack doctor was regularly prescribing for the patients who visited him. The officer immediately proceeded to the house indicated and there found the man magnificently installed in a suite of sumptuously furnished apartments. The outer rooms were crowded with well dressed and apparently wealthy persons who were waiting their turn for admission to the consulting-room. He arrested him, and hurried him before a police-court judge. The prisoner asked for a private interview with that functionary and after some hesitation it was accorded. At the close, to the amazement of the policeman who made the arrest and thought he had a clear case, the prisoner was discharged without even being put on trial. A reporter succeeded in solving the mystery. The prisoner had produced a regular physician's diploma from the most famous French University, showing that its holder had received a first-class education, had passed his examination with honor, and had been duly authorized to practice medicine. He said that after leaving college he had established himself as a physician.

ALBERT-EDWARD, PRINCE OF WALES, ENGLAND'S FUTURE KING.

but no patients came and the doctor was soon face to face with starvation. Noticing that the quack doctors around him were prospering, he joined their ranks, carefully concealing the fact of his holding a diploma. Immediately the tide turned, his rooms were crowded with patients and he was in a fair way of making a fortune. He had begged the judge not to let the fact of his holding a diploma be known. He said that all his patients would desert him if they knew that he was a properly qualified physician. The same perversity characterizes the world in spiritual matters. Men will not go to God for enlightenment, but to spiritualists, fortune-tellers, and other charlatans:

When they shall say unto you seek unto them which have familiar spirits and unto wizards that peep and that mutter, should not a people seek unto their God? (Isa. 8:19)

A Dangerous Quicksand.

Numerous complaints were sent in recently to the Department of Public Works in New York of annoyance from noises at night. Residents on the East side of the city complained that they were awakened at unseasonable hours by workmen employed by the city hammering and clanging on metal in excavations under their houses. A delegation was organized and the irate citizens eloquently laid their grievances before the mayor. Then the cause of the trouble was explained. In making a sewer in that section of the city a quicksand had been found and it was in activity. The city surveyor feared that whole blocks of residences, some of them being flat houses in which lived many families, would be either swallowed up or overturned. The only effectual way of dealing with the quicksand was to lay caissons at short distances apart. This had been done and the work had been carried forward day and night because the danger to the people was serious and imminent. The facts had been concealed from the public lest there should be a panic. There will be no more complaining of the noise. The people will be glad to have the work go forward in the night, even if it does keep them awake, because they know it is insuring their safety. Perhaps there would be a similar cessation of repining under the dispensation of God's providence, if we knew what dangers to our spiritual and eternal safety they are intended to avert.

Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness. (Heb. 12:11)

Nature's Own Defence.

A remarkable discovery which it is thought will revolutionize the system of medical research is described in the New York Herald.

A physician states that for years he has been grappling with a problem that has taxed all his skill. He found that it was easy to destroy in his laboratory the microbes which are the germs of typhoid and other diseases. He applied the same methods in the patient's body which had been successful in killing the microbe in the laboratory but he was not successful. The patients grew worse and died. There was a flaw somewhere and the physician set himself to discover how it was that a poison which would kill the microbe in a glass tube in his laboratory would not kill it when found in the patient's intestines. He discovered that nature has armed the body with the power of killing, or eliminating, the microbe, or of depriving it of its mischievous powers. The antiseptic administered to destroy the microbe was destructive also of the power of defence which nature had provided. In normal conditions and in a healthy constitution the physical organism might be trusted to deal with the invading microbe in one of its three modes of warfare. It sometimes failed, because the patient was depleted in strength, or because while the battle was raging, he made mistakes in his diet which gave aid to the enemy.

Having made this discovery, the physician tried to ascertain the best means of increasing nature's power of resistance. Concentrating his attention on the typhoid microbe he learned that cold baths and copious drinking effected this result. Neither practice had any effect on the microbe but they strengthened the natural forces and gave them vigor for their fight with this particular microbe. With this mode of treatment the deaths from typhoid diminished from nineteen in every hundred cases to four. The physician states his belief that a similar discovery may be made as to pneumonia, diphtheria, grip, and other germ diseases, and that the true course of medicine is to reach in each case the discovery of the means, not of killing the microbes, but of strengthening nature and enabling her to get rid of the invader in her own way. The treatment of spiritual disorders should proceed on the same principle. The evil thoughts which are the germs of evil life cannot always be excluded, but they need not be welcomed and entertained. They stay to do their evil work only in minds where there is no other tenant to dispute possession with them.

When he cometh he findeth it empty, swept and garnished. Then goeth he and taketh with himself seven spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there. (Matt. 12:44)

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

WESTERN RANCH LIFE.

It Has Many Drawbacks as well as Attractions—A Training-School Full of Perils for the Young.

RANCH life on the great grazing grounds of the West, although painted in roseate hues that appeal to and attract the young imagination, has many drawbacks and dangers that ought to be told with equal frankness. It is a great mistake to sacrifice truth for mere picturesque effect, and the writer or journal guilty of so doing is sowing the seed of trouble and sorrow in many homes. We have heard lately of a case where the only son of a very worthy family, after reading a glowing article on the life of a cowboy, determined to sacrifice his education and prospects, and lead the picturesque life of a cow-herd. To the parents, such a decision must prove very painful, as they doubtless had hopes of a brilliant and useful future for their boy, where he would not be thrown into contact with the thousand and one temptations, the vicious associations and the wicked companions he is liable to encounter in such a life as he has chosen. It is undeniable that there is a charm for the youthful mind in the freedom and comradeship of ranch life. Home duties and restraints seem irksome, by contrast with the liberty of the ranch, and the young lad, seeing its attractions but none of its faults, too often throws caution to the winds and leaves his home and friends for the new career. A very brief experience—a few weeks at most—will be sufficient to undeceive him. If he has lived in a quiet country home, in or near some village, beside dear friends and church privileges, he will value them now, if never before, when he is far from home and friends and the sound of church bells. He will soon be ready to admit that ranch life is not the paradise he pictured; that the herders are by no means to be envied, being for the most part drudges, with no opportunities of social enjoyment and culture, seeing little of books, with scant facilities even for ordinary cleanliness and whose duties, lately so picturesque in his eyes, are really limited to "keeping track" of the herd the whole season, and seeing that it does not stray off the land. Indeed, it does not stray off the land. Indeed, it does not stray off the land. Indeed, it does not stray off the land.

Ranch life is beset on every side by vicious influences, and it is not surprising that the herders are, in the main, ignorant and shiftless, though brave and kind-hearted. It is a false glamor that leads young people from good homes and prospects to take up a career from which the bitterness of disappointment will in all likelihood result.

The Value of Concentration.

A distinguished teacher, in illustrating the value of concentration, or "singleness of purpose," used to relate this classical incident to the boys under his charge:

Drono, desiring to test his scholars' use of the bow, prepared an imitation vulture and placed it on a tree. Then calling them all, he showed them the bird, and ordered them to bring their bows and shoot at it. "When I speak," he said, "let the one I command shoot it in the head." The eldest was called first to take aim, and the teacher asked, "Do you see the vulture?" "Yes, I see it," was the reply. "Can you see me, the tree, or your brothers as well?" was the next inquiry. "Sir," the youth replied, "I can see all of you." Displeased at this the teacher then said, "You cannot take aim. Move off." The rest of the disciples, one after another, were thus repulsed till he called Aurjoon and told him to try. Taking aim, he awaited the word of command; but the teacher asked, "Can you see me, the tree, and the vulture, too?" "Sir," he answered, "I can see the bird, but nothing else." Drono was delighted at this, and asked, "How much of the vulture do you see?" and the disciple answered, "Nothing but his head." Then receiving the word of command, he shot the arrow and brought the bird to the ground. The master of archery embraced his scholar, and rejoiced as one victorious in battle.

How to Make a Room Fragrant.

you have used the half-peck of rose leaves and a half-pint of salt. After five days have elapsed the leaves will be nearly dry. Then add three ounces of coarsely ground allspice, and one ounce of stick cinnamon broken into small pieces. Then allow it to stand one week, turning daily. After this, place in a permanent jar, adding one ounce of allspice, half a pound of fresh dried lavender blossoms, the rose leaf stock, one ounce of cloves, one ounce of cinnamon, two grated nutmegs, one ounce of ginger root sliced thin, half ounce of anise seed, ten grains of finest Canton musk, two ounces of orris root sliced thin, one ounce of the essential oil of rose geranium, half an ounce of each of the essential oils of jessamine, lavender, lemon, verbena, musk, violet, rosemary, and bergamot. Add from time to time, as convenient, rose water, cologne, extracts, etc.

This is kept in a sitting-room or parlor, or any other room that may be selected.

few days ago, that the aged Queen Victoria had been afflicted with blindness, and that, though she might hear the shout of acclaim from her patriotic subjects, she could never see their faces again. For the reports of her blindness are believed to have been greatly exaggerated. She can probably see as clearly old folks of seventy-eight. Victoria always been a popular personage among the people. Although small in stature, she has a dignified presence and a noble and engaging manner. "I am small for a Queen," she used to say, although courtesy usually named her height as five feet two. The little and a few others in the secret kitchen, she was only four feet eleven inches high. Sir Edwin Arnold quotes the Bishop of Peterborough as saying that Victoria's face has become "almost divine" subjects. Although a rigid disciplinarian in all matters of court etiquette, she was kind at heart and so she seized every opportunity to show her kindness, that this generous affection for her is no wonder at. She had a remarkably fine memory and was able to recall, after the lapse of many years, the names of the Ladies who have been presented at Court, has surprised at a single dropped by the Queen, showed that she remembered them, though she probably had not seen them or heard of them since childhood.

THE CHILDREN UP IN HEAVEN.

"THERE'S a dear little girl coming home to-day!"
Oh, what do you think the angels say?"
Said the children up in heaven;
"There's a dear little girl coming home to-day!"
She's almost ready to fly away
From the earth we used to live in.
Let's go and open the gates of pearl,
Open them wide for the new little girl,"
Said the children up in heaven.
"God wanted her here, where his little ones
Said the children up in heaven. [meet,"
"She shall play with us in the golden street;
She has grown too fair, she has grown too sweet
For the earth we used to live in;
She needs the sunshine, this dear little girl,
That gilds this side of the gates of pearl,"
Said the children up in heaven.
"So the King called down from the angels' dome,"
Said the children up in heaven.
"My little darling, arise and come,

Put the mixture in a fancy jar with a lid. Keep closed, but open once a day to odorize the room. The perfume is delightful, and will last for many years.

To the place prepared in thy Father's home,
To the home that my children live in;
Let's go and watch at the gates of pearl,
Ready to welcome the new little girl,"
Said the children up in heaven.
"Far down on the earth do you hear them
Said the children up in heaven. [weep?"
"For the dear little girl has gone to sleep!
The shadows fall and the night-clouds sweep
O'er the earth we used to live in;
But we'll go and open the gates of pearl;
Oh! why do they weep for their dear little girl?"
Said the children up in heaven.
"Fly with her quick, O, angel dear!"
Said the children up in heaven.
"See, she is coming! Look there! Look there!
At the Jasper light on her sunny hair!
Where the veiling clouds are riven.
Ah! hush! hush! hush! all the swift wings furl;
For the King himself at the gates of pearl
Is taking her hand, dear, tired little girl,
And leading her into heaven!"

A Young Girl's Feather Problem.

Can a robin be talked? We know that the little bird is a clever and exceedingly intelligent creature. This story, which reads from Albany, N. Y., is one that will awaken interest among bird lovers. As far as the robin is concerned, Miss Bartlett, a young woman who lives on Wooster street, that according to a conversation with a talking robin, she was wondering of the neighbor. She found the robin on the sidewalk in front of her home a few days ago. The bird had toppled out of its nest, being too young to fly, was in great danger of being killed by a cat. She caught the bird, took it into her home, and provided it with a cage, and soon tenderly attached to it. The bird thrived, and watched with eager interest all the actions of the family. One day, spring the robin surprised its mistress by imitating speech. Under the teacher's careful training, the conversation, it is now able to say a number of words intelligently. The words are: "Hurry up!" it utters with a whistling sound. The robin also successfully imitates the whistles of a variety of birds. Thus far, however, it has not been able to learn any tunes. We wonder if our readers have ever heard of a talking robin.

A Mother's Prayers.

There is no such time for a mother as when she is in the midst of an impressive display of her love and devotion toward her child as in the earliest years of his life. The recollection of a mother's prayers often has a powerful influence on him which he neither can nor would forget.

MISSIONARY SERVICE.

Responsibility of Individual Christians to the Conversion of the World.

Every Christian ought to be a missionary at heart. Though he may not go out to heathen lands to carry the message of the Gospel, there is an abundance of missionary work to be done within our own land. No one with a heart to work for the Lord will die. In all our great cities there are as thoroughly heathen as can be found in Africa or China. Even in our great towns and in the country there are many who do not know by experience the power of the Christian Gospel. Sometimes greater patience is required to bring them into the Kingdom than it does those who have heard the Gospel message. The Gospel is as precious as the other, and the world is to be won for the Saviour. Domestic heathen must be brought in as those "who are not of this world." There is not the fascination or the excitement about going into a neighborhood, or into a mission service, as there is in braving the dangers of a foreign land, or the terrors of an African jungle, but the one work needs to be done as much as the other. We have a Christian man and his wife stand at the corner in New York speaking to a throng as hard and callous as any promiser as ever assembled on a street preacher in India. They rebuff, ribald retorts, and brutal blows are hurled at them, and that woman, who might have been comforted at home over a book, has taken a stroll through the park to see the work in earning a livelihood out to face that treatment in that some poor lost soul might be turned to God. Others there do a different kind of work as well in its way and as noble. The young children, among the vicious and depraved, discharged prisoners, and among the employees—all this waits to be done by the Christian with the missionary in his heart. It is part of the work of winning the whole world, which is the object that takes the missionary across the sea; the message is the same, and the same power is needed to make the work effective in the case as in the other. The great missionary spirit, the willingness to testify for Christ in the sphere where his lot is cast, is the same. The Christian takes upon himself the work of Christ, he enlists as a soldier in the war. Whether he remains at home or goes on foreign service, his duties and obligations are the same. Whether he may be stationed, his duty is to promote the interests of the Kingdom by every means in his power. If he is in some quiet country village, he is engaged in seeing that the cause of the Lord is prospering there and that new converts are being enlisted to take the place of the veterans who grow old and die. There is in a town many forms of missionary work are open to him. He should see that they ought to have his aid, and he should be the devoted, consecrated man, a woman who have gone out to the ends to preach the Gospel ought to have our sympathy. They should be remembered in our prayers and their work should be strengthened by our prayers. There is scarcely a missionary in the world today that has not offers of service that it cannot avail itself of. Some of the responsibility for the conversion of the world can be discharged by contributing to the treasury and inducing others to do so. Missionaries are crippled and retarded in their work by the poverty of the funds; other missionaries might be sent out if there were only funds to defray the expenses. What must Christ do about that fact? He gave his life for the world, but they do not know of it because they do not have money enough to send the Gospel to the perishing millions. Even in our own land, the plea for money to give an education to colored children is heard, and the south often falls on deaf ears. The need of money is urgent and imperative, and who cannot go to carry the Gospel to a heathen land or to the ends of his own land, may serve the cause by replenishing the treasuries.

THE PATH.

WITH tear-dimmed eyes and varied fears,
We slowly cross the flood of years—
Till in some rosy sunset glow,
We quit these rugged roads below,
And greet the mount of God.
Could life's sharp crags be brought so low,
And smoothed wherein they bruised us so.

Then heaven's path would be a plane
To easy run without the pain.
And thorns our feet have trod,
Let him be praised who set the stones
And goads of which creation groans.
Some time they'll bring a greater weight
Of glory just beyond the gate.
Where sits the throne of God.

Secor. 1a. —O. M. H.

IN HIS HANDS.

"Though he slay me yet will I trust him."

GOD holds the future in his hand.
Oh, heart of mine be still!
His love will plan the best for thee,
The best tho' light or dark it be.
Then rest thee in his will.

God holds the future in his hand.
Why should I shrink or fear?
Through every dark and cloudy day
Yea, all along my pilgrim way.
His love will bless and cheer.

God holds the future in his hand
And I can trust his love.
The past declares his faithfulness.
His eye will guide, his heart will bless
Till I am safe above.

God holds the future in his hand,
I leave it all to him.
I know one day he will explain
The wherefore of each grief and pain,
Though reasons now are dim.

THY WILL BE DONE.

THY will be done, thy will, thy will;
Although it may with anguish fill
My heaving breast, I trust and say
Thy will be done, my God, to-day.

Thy will, thy will be done, O God;
Although it hide beneath the sod
The darling of my heart and home;
Thy will, though I be in the gloam.

Thy will be done, thy will, thy will;
E'en though like early frost it kill
The roses of my inmost heart;
I trust my God, while they depart.

Thy will be done, thy will, my God;
I bend submissive to thy rod;
Through scalding tears I look above.
And know, O God, that thou art love.

Thy will be done: my will I yield
Until thy purpose be revealed.
The struggle, now, O God, is past,
And peace abides with me at last.

Submissive to thy will I'm blessed,
For thy will, gracious God, is best.
No evil can my soul betide,
Because in thee, my God, I hide.

THE LAST KING.

The Identity of the Eighth King of Revelation Who will be the Last World Ruler Before Christ Comes.

BY GEORGE H. PEMBER.

John's description of the Beast, the seven heads are said (Rev. 17: 10, 11) to signify seven kings, while the Beast himself represents an eighth. Of these eight monarchs, we are told that five had already fallen, that one was in existence when John wrote, and that a seventh was yet to come; and then an eighth, who would be one of the seven, and would be so identified with the World-power, so perfect an exponent of the popular will, that he is not called a head, but rather the very Beast himself. The five kings are said to have fallen. From the use in the Apocalypse of the verb "to fall" we may, perhaps, infer that they died by violent, and not by natural, deaths.

In the description of the thirteenth chapter, we are told that names of blasphemy were upon the seven heads of the Beast. This apparently indicates that each of the seven kings, as well as the eighth, who is the Beast, would set themselves forth as gods to the world. So far, therefore, we seem to have the following data for the identification of these kings: They are all monarchs of the fourth, or Roman, World-power; five of them had already died by violent deaths, before John saw the vision; a sixth was reigning at the time of the vision; the seventh and eighth were yet to come; all were, or would be, worshipped as gods.

Now, so far as we can judge from their history, the five who had fallen were probably Julius Cæsar, Tiberius, Claudius, Caligula and Nero. The sixth was doubtless Domitian, during whose reign John appears to have received the revelation. He was the last of the twelve Cæsars, and directed the second persecution of the Church.

Between the sixth and the seventh it may be that a considerable space of time intervenes; there is possibly a hint of this in the words, "The other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a little while." Perhaps he is still in the future; but there are some reasons for believing that he has already appeared in the person of the first Napoleon.

In regard to the eighth king, we seem able, by putting together the information of the thirteenth and seventeenth chapters, to deduce the following particulars. The seventeenth chapter describes him as one of the seven kings—that is, one of them resuscitated. And, this being the case, there is no mention of an eighth head, but only of an eighth king. In the thirteenth chapter also there is no notice of an eighth head; but John perceived that one of the seven had been slain unto death—that is, had been unmistakably slain—and while he was gazing upon it, the head revived, and thus plainly indicated the meaning of the statement in the later vision that the last king "is of the seven."

Thus the eighth king is one of the seven raised from the dead; and, accordingly, it is said that the Beast which represents him will ascend out of the abyss, or place of the dead. By keeping this in mind we shall understand his ultimate fate, and also that of the False Prophet; for being both of them re-incarnated spirits, and having, therefore, already experienced the first death, they are not, when seized at the height of their rebellion, cast into the abyss, but hurled alive into the lake of fire and brimstone. For it is appointed unto men once to die, and afterwards comes the judgment.

Again: John is told of the Beast which is the eighth king, that he "was, and is not, and is about to come up out of the abyss, and to go into perdition." Or, in other words, he had been upon earth before John saw the vision, was then in the place of the dead, and would in future time ascend therefrom, and head the great rebellion which would cause him to be consigned to everlasting perdition. Therefore, this terrible being, who will a second time trouble the world, cannot be the sixth or seventh king, but must be one of those who had already fallen at the time of the vision.

MISSIONARIES GRATEFUL.

Remittances from "The Christian Herald" Relief Fund Enabling Them to Save the Lives of the Starving People—The Chairman of the Committee of Distribution.

LETTERS recently received from the devoted men and women who are feeding the starving people around their stations in India, with food purchased with the money contributed by our readers, show how grateful they are for the timely aid thus rendered. Many of them have begun relief work on so extensive a scale that they frankly admit that they have no time to write more than a brief expression of heartfelt thanks, as they are so busy in arranging for the relief of the sufferers. Extracts from a few of these letters we print on this page. Our readers will notice with satisfaction that in several instances the money arrived in time to succor Christian people who having been ostracized for confessing Christ, were in dire need. In many instances, the missionaries plead for further remittances—Mr. Powell, the Baptist missionary, especially asks for more help because of the suffering around him—and all are anxious that the good work they have begun should not be interrupted. Long before this, our latest remittance of forty thousand dollars has reached the Inter-denominational Committee for distribution. Messrs. Thomas Cook & Sons, the well-known tourist agents of Broadway, New York, kindly undertook to cable this remittance at their own cost, thus relieving the Fund of all telegraphic expenses. This generous help should have been acknowledged in our last week's issue.

That the help, thus sent, was badly needed to carry the people over the hard time which must elapse before the crops now being sown can grow and ripen, there is abundant evidence. One convincing proof is that the number of persons on the Government Relief Works is now over four millions, a larger number than have ever been maintained since the beginning of the famine. In spite of this help and in spite of the relief given by the missionaries, large numbers are dying whom it has been impossible to reach. Rev. Robert Wilder of Poona, who is now in New York, says that he has just received a letter from India which says that the people are dying by hundreds.

On this page we print a photograph of Bishop J. M. Thoburn who is Chairman of the Interdenominational Committee which is distributing the fund of forty thousand dollars cabled by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to India. Bishop Thoburn is a native of Ohio. He was educated at Allegheny College and went to India in 1859. During his work as a missionary he edited the Indian Witness, and thoroughly familiarized himself with missionary work in all parts of India. In 1888 he was elected Bishop of India by the General Conference which in that year assembled in New York.

The following extracts from the letters of missionaries in India will be read with interest:

Rev. William Powell, Baptist missionary of Neusarapetta, in the Madras Presidency, writes:

I am very grateful indeed to you, for your kindness in sending this money for our people. I will see that it is spent to the very best advantage of the people and the mission.

On the banks of the river Krishna, near Bezvada, which is a part of my field, about four hundred Christians had their houses and crops washed away by the great floods in August last, and many of them have not been able to rebuild their homes through lack of means. Their crops were so completely washed away that they are now without hardly a meal a day. Neither is there any work whatever to be had at present in these parts. I have appealed to Government for assistance for them, but failed to get any for them, to rebuild their houses. Their wells were also filled up by these floods, and at present they are put to great inconvenience for water.

In the south-west part of my field also, on account of the failure of the rains in August and October, the crops entirely failed. In this part about five hundred of our Christians are really in want of food. These people will hardly be able to get a day's labor until next July, when the rains are expected. The money which you have kindly sent me I intend to use to help those people to rebuild their homes, clean out their wells, and buy seed for the next crop. To the very poor, sick and aged, I will distribute food and clothes, also a little money; but labor alone will be given to the able-bodied, Christians or non-Christians.

Rev. H. Forman, of Fatehpore, in the North-west Provinces, writes:

I have read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, of April 7th, that you contemplated sending a steamship loaded with grain from San Francisco. Help for the people of India could certainly take no more practical form. And beyond this the fact that this is done in the name of Christ, is a testimony which the people are not blind to. An old woman said yesterday, here in the relief camp in our mission compound, "Jesus Christ has our stomachs filled,"—using the causal form of the verb, i.e., that which one does through an agent. I hope to be able to get some of the grain for our poor here. This is one of the sorely stricken districts, and the doctor was telling me yesterday that the death rate per mille is higher here than in any other district in North India. We have almost four hundred persons in the mission compound, whom we are providing for with the money sent out by Christian people. The pressure of the famine is becoming more and more distressing as the hot season advances, as indeed was clearly foreseen must be the case. We are having many applications daily for admission.

The following are the names of those who contributed for the famine-stricken people of India the gifts of corn which were forwarded in cars as per list in last week's issue:

HEROIC PERSONALITIES

BY REV. LOUIS ALBERT BANKS, DD

The Birth of Liberty's Hymn.

SHALL never forget an afternoon in the Boston Theatre, on the occasion of an Author's Reading, given in the aid of a fund for the Longfellow Memorial. Of the splendid group that gathered on the platform to read their own writings, three of the stars greatest magnitude have been transcribed the sky above the sky. Russell Lowell was a most striking figure that afternoon, and read in aid of a short poem of his own composition for the occasion. Longfellow's "Song of the Ship." He was not a leader from the elocutionist's point of view, but that splendid head is photogenic on my mind, and the tones of his voice came back as but yesterday. Oliver Wendell Holmes, cheerful as always, shed light from face and eye as a bouquet of sheds fragrance. His reading of "My Q." gave universal delight. William Curtis, the last of that translated literary saints, read from "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" with a graceful dignity which seemed like an atmosphere.

Those who still remain none was away with more expressions of pleasure. Perhaps no reading aroused such enthusiasm as Julia Ward Howe and her "The Battle Hymn of the Republic." I remember another occasion when I read her own story of how that introduction was conceived. It was the stormy times of 1861, when in prison with Dr. S. G. Howe, her heroic partner whom a more daring and eventful man America never produced.

All Readers.—The New Cure for Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

As told in the last issue the new botanical discovery, is proving a wonderful curative in cases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disordered action of the kidneys and urinary organs. The New York World publishes the remarkable testimony of A. C. Darling, minister of the gospel in Constantinople, New York, cured by Alkavis, he says himself, he had lost faith in medicine, and was preparing himself for certain death. Similar testimony to this wonderful remedy comes from others, including many suffering from disorders peculiar to woman, such as the Church Kidney Cure Co., of No. 118 Broadway, New York, who so far are its only agents, are so anxious to prove its value that for introduction they will send a free treatise prepaid by mail to every reader of the Christian Herald who is a sufferer from any kidney or bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Neuralgia, or other affliction due to impurities of the kidneys or urinary organs. Send all sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. These wonderful curative powers, it is sent to every one free.

Readers write that they have been given new strength by Hood's Sarsaparilla. It is a blood purifier, consequently is the true tonic. It gives renewed vigor.

Mrs. Howe was visiting Washington. The city was surrounded on every side by soldiers and they had been compelled to make their way to the Capitol through lines of guarding sentries. One day, in company with Dr. James Freeman Clarke and his wife, Dr. and Mrs. Howe were escorted out to the front to see the army, but were driven back by a sudden attack on the part of the enemy. Mrs. Howe was greatly impressed by the long lines of soldiers, and the devotion and enthusiasm which they evinced. They were singing as they marched, "John Brown's Body." James Freeman Clarke, seeing Mrs. Howe's deep emotion, which was evinced by her intense face, said:

"You ought to write some new words to go with that tune."

"I will," she earnestly replied.

She went back to Washington, went to bed, and finally fell asleep. She awoke in the night to find her now famous hymn forming in her brain. It took such tremendous hold upon her that she could not wait until morning, but got up and wrote it down in the gray dawn. What sublime and splendid words they were she wrote. There is in them the spirit of the old prophets. Nothing could be grander than the first line.

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord.

In the second verse one sees through her eyes the vivid picture she had witnessed in her afternoon's visit to the army. I have seen him in the watchtowers of a hundred circling camps:

They have builded him an altar in the evening dews and damps:

I can read his righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps:

His day is marching on.

In the last two verses there was a triumphant note of daring faith and prophecy that was wonderfully contagious, and millions of men and women took heart again, as they read or sang it, and caught its optimistic note.

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat.

He is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgment seat:

Oh, be swift, my soul, to answer him! be jubilant, my feet!

Our God is marching on!

This hymn which was destined to have such world-wide appreciation, won its first victory in Libby Prison. It was printed in the newspapers, and a copy of one containing it was smuggled into the prison where many hundreds of Northern officers and soldiers were confined. Among these was the brilliant Chaplain C. C. McCabe, now Bishop McCabe. The chaplain could sing anything and make music out of it, but he seized on this splendid battle hymn with a frenzy of delight. It makes the blood boil again in one's veins with patriotic enthusiasm to hear him tell how the tears rained down strong men's cheeks, as they sang in the Southern prison, far away from home and friends, those wonderful closing lines:

In the beauty of the lilies Christ was born across the sea,

With a glory in his bosom that transfigures you and me;

As he died to make men holy, let us die to make men free.

While God is marching on.

Our Little Wards at Oorfa.

Miss Shattuck Writes of the Destitute Armenian Orphans for whom our Readers have Provided.

IN a letter from Oorfa, Turkey, dated May 11th, Miss Corinna Shattuck gives these interesting details of the work among the orphan children:

The German friends sent by Dr. Lepsius (two gentlemen and a lady) arrived May 25th. They have been in our home studying the language they will need here in Oorfa, and becoming acquainted with the dear children in the three Orphan Homes; also in every possible way assisting us in the work and care which press heavily upon my associate, Miss Chambers, and myself. We rejoice that these new co-laborers are deeply spiritual and most efficient and practical persons. All have had experience as teachers. Mr. Eckhard and Miss Patrunke are direct from Germany. Mr. Fallscheer, whose parents have long been missionaries in Nablous, has taught the past three years in Bishop Gobat's school in Jerusalem, and has command of the Arabic language, which is not, however, much used in this city.

More commodious rooms have been rented for the "Lepsius Girls," as the household has been steadily increasing during the winter and spring, and our Harris Girls have taken the former Lepsius Home.

Another house has also been rented with the plan of dividing our much-crowded household of 111 boys. This plan we early decided upon, even while waiting the decision as to whether the Germans should have a share in support of the boys, or whether we retained all for support by American funds. It now seems to us that we shall be able to about equally divide the boys, which will leave a very good number for the capacity of our American Home, with the "Summer Home" additions, and those on the east and west by recent purchase of rooms adjacent to our building.

Twenty of our boys are provided for by funds secured by Mr. Wistar who was here about a year ago, and on his return interested the "Friends" of U. S. A. in our children. We consider the remainder of the household, with the exception of about a half dozen who are supported by individuals in England and the U. S., as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD children, and will endeavor regularly and freely to inform you of these. We are very thankful that so many are likely to remain directly under our care; all have become very dear to us; all are healthy, active children, still only when asleep or assembled for family prayers. A lull occurs three times a day, when they are gathered about the dining-tables. At Easter the people use eggs freely, yet I was surprised when our steward gave 4.800 as the number purchased for the orphans that week. They had, besides these, on the tables as part of the regular food, four each in bright colors to play with, and eat when they pleased. I could but contrast these happy little ones with the general condition of a year before, when we dispensed a very small amount of "yagh" (native butter) to our widows and orphans, feeling they had need of it for nourishment and were unable to buy for themselves. We were almost alarmed then that the bill ran up to £40, and the needy on the list exceeded 2,300. Now most of these are in very tolerable circumstances, through the aid we are able yet to continue in fortnightly dispensings from our "shop" of a few drams of yagh, salt, soap, and a little wheat, with the small sum of cash to get it ground for flour. Then there is the work given in our several industrial departments, by which most of the women and girls can earn a partial support. We have two hundred in the silk embroidery, more than seventy in the handkerchief department and a set of weavers and spinners in the carpet line of rugs and kelims, besides the cotton spinning (that is a standby for such as can do only that simple work their grandmothers and the generations before them did). They are a people most worthy of our aid. I consider it a privilege to serve them personally and to be one with our many American people in the good work.

This astonishes people and a crowd will gather to see the freezer in operation and they will all want to try the cream. You can sell cream as fast as it can be made, and sell freezers to many of them who would not buy an old style freezer. It is really a curiosity and you can sell from $2 to $4 worth of cream and six to twelve freezers every day. This makes a good profit these hard times and is a pleasant employment. W. H. A-head of Pearline?

Never! Not a bit of it! That is out of the question. Probably not one of the many washing-powders that have been made to imitate Pearline would claim to excel it in any way. All they ask is to be considered "the same as" or "as good as" Pearline. But they're not even that. Pearline is today, just as it has been from the first, the best thing in the world for every kind of washing and cleaning.

Send it Back

Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. JAMES PYLE, New York.

THE KING'S HIGHWAY

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

CHAPTER XV—Continued.
Coming Back.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

THERE are strong and inscrutable ties that unite, without our seeing how or when, and John's words were not all of their intercourse. For though he said nothing of love, but "dear Alice," his glance prolonged the impression of the simple address, and went where speech could not reach.

To take the heart by surprise! Oh, this is the way of love! There had been no intention in John's mind of speaking to Alice on that day. He thought it was yet too early, but when the hour arrives, the deed set for it is always accomplished. She came into the room just after John's arrival, and her presence affected him with an indescribable delight. Her easy dignified manner had in it something maidenly, impossible to be described, and as she passed John, the air seemed to imbibe that fragrance it does from a swaying flower. He rose to meet her, and she looked at him with eyes of a religious purity and a sunshine on her face that came from a far sunnier glow within.

He was suddenly impatient to know his fate. He asked her to walk in the garden with him, and she went, though she knew well what he was going to say to her. She only wondered that he had not spoken before. Silently, hand in hand, they strolled to the outermost wall, and leaning over it, watched the sea, and listened to its voice among the rocks—deep and melancholy as a page out of Beethoven. The air around them held a caress of scent; their eyes met; their fingers touched, and John said as he interlaced them:

"This little, white, warm hand! Give it to me! I love you, Alice! If you will be my wife, I will love you more and more, as long as I live!"

And Alice answered:

"I love you, John! I have loved you ever since we met. I will be your wife."

All the words they said were these words. Their feeling was too deep and too sincere to need superfluities. It was an hour of perfect understanding and perfect bliss, and they lengthened it until the shadows fell coldly upon them, and the lights shone in the windows of the house, and they knew that inquiry must soon be made for them. Then they went into the midst of the gathered family, and John told the story; there was no need to tell. It had been guessed by every one, and every one was glad in its promise and happiness. Suddenly Steve spoke:

"There is one thing, John," he said, "one thing to be greatly desired, and that is that you should be married immediately and live happy ever afterwards. I think you had better look to this end, and at once; for Alice's fate has a trick of breaking off her marriage."

The words were said in joke, but taken up very seriously. There was indeed no necessity for delay, and many reasons for not delaying. The principal one was a purpose in Steve's mind of taking a long sea journey. This health had been much impaired by his terrible vigil. It was imperative that he should have an absolute change; and the strength of that solitude and sequestration which was his soul's native air. The woods and the sea called him with a voice that he could not deny. They called him whether he was sleeping or waking, and he trembled and pined like a will bird in a cage, for the freedom they only could give him.

Jessie had been the first to urge this change, but when once it was spoken of, every one that knew and loved Steve recognized its wisdom. So it had come to be an understood thing that as soon as the winter was over, Steve should go round the world in such leisurely fashion as might occupy a twelve months if he so wished. Therefore it was quite natural that John should object to a delay so unnecessary. And when lovers have a point to carry, they generally succeed in carrying it. At any rate, John did. He was of course supported by Steve, and not seriously opposed by either Mrs. Lloyd or Alice. So the bliss that he had not dared to hope for, came by patient waiting, and one bright morning, just before Christmas, Alice Lloyd became the bride of John and happiness.

Early in the following spring, Steve began to prepare for the voyage his soul desired. He and John had many long conferences, and John was much astonished at the care and thoughtfulness for the future the usually careless Steve manifested. He made some remark about this peculiarity, and Steve answered:

"I am not sure, if I shall ever come back home again, John. I wish above all things the continuance and prosperity of the charities we have begun to be assured and placed beyond dispute. It is right also that my own affairs should be put in such shape that Jessie may not have a single anxiety about money matters—or the future."

"What makes you have any doubts about your return home? Have you had any presentiment of death? If so, do not leave New York."

"My death is in the hands of Him who is as much in one place as another. And I am constrained to go. The thought of freedom has become a passion that I cannot control—that I do not desire to control. Only Jessie could keep me here, and Jessie is perfectly willing that I should have that respite from conventional life which is now an imperative demand of my nature. I want liberty. I want to be free. I want it so much that I think the whole world will be too small for my craving. Only eternity can satisfy it. Why, John, if I say but the word 'freedom' my whole nature sings to it."

"A desire so imperative is more than a desire. It is a command, Steve."

"I think so, John."

"Then God go with you!"

"I shall not get beyond his guiding and preserving hand."

So the preparations for this journey went steadily forward and at length the time fixed for Steve's departure arrived. On the night before it, John and he sat together, long after the household were asleep. Steve had been very quiet and thoughtful all the previous week, for grave and momentous questions, relating to the future of his family and his many benevolent enterprises, had been constantly occupying his mind. John, however, understood that Steve had a great nature, never quite at home on this earth. He was at best an exile with the "homeing" passion, stronger than any lure that this life could offer him. Indeed Steve himself was frequently aware of being something of an enigma even to those who loved him best. He had thoughts and feelings often about which he did not care to speak. That very night as he had stood with his family watching the sun set, and listening to their remarks about the beauty of the scene, he had been intensely conscious of what others had not been conscious of. For even to John the setting sun was only a yellow disk, disappearing in a purple and golden glory, but to Steve the heavens had been opened and he had seen a vision in those marvelously tinted clouds, of dazzling temples and the crowded pinions of cherubims, and the multitude no man can number. And this vision though seen "through a glass darkly" had made him homesick and silent, because he feared to be misunderstood.

"What are you thinking about, Steve," at length asked John, "Are you quite satisfied with the arrangements made for carrying on the work in your absence?"

"Yes—and no. Ought I to leave the whole weight on your shoulders, while I seek my own health and happiness?"

"But while you are seeking your own, you will find for others. You intend, do you not, to examine the charities of the great European cities, in order to adopt any really good idea?"

"I do. And I shall keep you posted, John, for if I find a good thing, you must carry it forward at once. No need to wait for my return. And, by-the-by, I was through a State Institution for the Insane yesterday, and I noticed over all the doors of every department, this admirable motto—'Put yourself in his place.' John, the best of stewards, the most faithful of philanthropic workers, needs such a reminder constantly. Would the men and women we have put in charge, be any worse for such a noble order, ever before their eyes?"

"I think they would be much better. It would help us, every one. Say that an unemployed workman came for money to go to Pittsburg, would he not be likely to get it, more kindly and cheerfully, if our agent 'put himself in the man's place?' I am sure he would. And the same result would follow, in all the branches of 'The King's Highway Fund.'"

"The Unemployed Workman! Oh John, he is as great a tragedy as Hamlet or the Oedipus. How is the Land Scheme going on?"

"Not as rapidly as I wish it was. Men do not want to take the least obligation, and men who do not want to take an obligation so easy, and so self-respecting as you have made it, are not the men who will build up cities in the wilderness, and make the desert blossom as the rose. If you gave them the land absolutely, without pay, or even promise to pay, they would not value it, or cultivate it—yet, that is what the majority want."

"I know," said Steve with a smile as sad as it was merry—

Divide the land among the people,
And give it them quite cost free;
To Bridget ten acres, to Pat ten pole,
And a thousand to Mrs. O'Shea.
Answer me now and say.

What would they do with it, John?"

"Sell it for as much cash as they could get. Still the settlement is growing; and a good charity must grow; it cannot be manufactured."

"Well, don't get discouraged John. It is enough for me to have that failing. So often I say to myself, 'how small a space I fill in this great teeming world of laborers! How little I can do! How marred that little is by my ignorance and inefficiency! And then my soul is weary and hopeless of its work, and only prays to be counted with those worshippers 'who lie before God's altar and are still.'"

"No! no Steve! It is not our duty to weigh our work or its results. When you feel this spiritual lassitude, then is the time to bid your soul arise and join that nobler band whose worship is not idle, and dumb, and fruitless. Neither you nor I would be happy in the passive joys of contemplation; we want no lotos land of musing, mystical worship; we want the wages of going on and of doing good with every sense we have—or shall have. I expect great things from your European investigations."

"You will be disappointed, John. As far as I can read or hear, America is already in the van of charitable Christian work."

"In the van let her always be."

"Yes, in some senses. But the van is not always the best place, because it is not the men who press to the van who are the most reliable and serviceable. Now I should always be there with my unsatisfied ideals and longings and my enthusiasms, urging men to impossibilities; but you, John, you are where the leader ought to be—just ahead of the great central force. From there you direct those that are too impetuous, and draw on those who have become weary."

THE FOURTH OF JULY.

DISTINGUISHED by a name and a numeral, our American Independence day comes smilingly on to us, in the vanguard of the mid-summer's heat and a er of the mid-summer's glowing abundant joy. Perhaps we spent a Fourth of July under trees. Until we do, I question we ever realize how unspeakably that bit of bunting, flying from and steamer and borne aloft before men on our gala days, cheers for the red, white and blue, a hundred cheers, men, with leaps faster and the blood with pride and gladness, for, in a land, one's heart remembers and turns to it yearningly and often. Independence Day should serve as a day for revivifying our patriotism, not for nothing that the old He- were accustomed over and over to children the story of how they of Egypt, how they were led the desert, a pillar of cloud before day, and a pillar of fire by night; y were fed with angel's food, the ined on their camp straight from and how at last they were brought the promised land." The competition of the national history an intense national pride and loyalty struck deep roots into the past, the Jew's best inheritance, sent her to son, the long ages through, cannot do better than to imitate the in this, and tell again and again of our country to our children people. A good investment for of growing children is a trust- history of our nation, and around book, as for instance, "The Ameri- cation," by John Fiske, might be the lives of Washington, Lincoln, and other statesmen, the poems of How and Whittier and Lowell, the of Emerson and of Holmes, and fiction is racy of the soil. Where cannot themselves afford to ac- books, they should avail them- the nearest library, and the home ould be nourished on literature spires love of the native land, love institutions which spring from lib- enlightenment, and love of the day.

turn back a leaf in the familiar and read it now on the eve of our Fourth. and that the Declaration of Inde- was unanimously adopted by of the thirteen colonies on the of July, 1776. New York deferred on in the matter until the ninth of en she, too, came into the brave mn league and covenant, by which orted our opposition once and for- taxation without representation, the cords that hitherto had bound a mother country.

ver the country the Declaration ived with bonfires, with the ring- bells, and the firing of guns, and chlight processions. Said Samuel "the people seem to recognize this on as though it were a decree pro- d from heaven."

You Asthma or Hay Fever?

Science at last reports a positive cure a and Hay-fever in the wonderful Kola new botanical discovery found on the over West Africa. Its cures are really s. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, writes that it cured him of Asthma of standing, and Hon. L. G. Clute, of Iowa, testifies that for three years he had dropped up in a chair in Hay-fever season, ble to lie down night or day. The Kola ed him at once. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, the Farmer's Magazine, was also cured ould not lie down for fear of choking, be- worse in Hay-fever season. Others of give similar testimony, proving it truly ful remedy. If you suffer from Asthma ver we advise you to send your address to Importing Co., 1164 Broadway, New York, to every reader of The Christian Herald. s it. All they ask in return is that when ells itself you will tell your neighbors about it. ost on nothing and you should surely try it.

No sudden impulsive act was this to which the brave signers of the Declara- tion set their hands. It was the culmination of eleven years of irritation, of struggle against injustice, of resistance to tyr- anny. John Fiske sums up the narrative of these trying times by the observation that "for the dignity, patience and moderation with which the Colonists had borne themselves, history hardly affords a parallel." There are many grand and noble figures on the splendid page which keeps that period green in memory, but foremost on the canvass for all time is that of our heroic George Washington, of Virginia first, next of the Union, next of the whole wide world.

As mothers, we are unworthy our high calling if we fail to impress on our sons and daughters both, the true grandeur of the men who formed this republic, and the true beauty and value of a free land, where the will of the people rules. The day has gone by when an autocracy can flourish anywhere. Waves sweeping upward on the shores of time, are laden with the flotsam and jetsam of outworn despotisms. Republicanism is bound to win all over the globe.

Teach the children patriotic songs. As they gather around the piano, let somebody strike up a ringing strain and let the family join in the "Star-spangled Banner" and "Yankee Doodle," and "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean." Bring the lads and lasses up on "My Country, 'tis of Thee." A sage said, "Let me make the songs of a nation. I care not who makes its laws!" From the lore of the cradle, and the memories of the hearthstone, and the lips of the mother, and the atmosphere of the home, and the public opinion of a community, where home life is on a high plane, comes a sentiment stronger than mere enactment, a sentiment which makes law powerful and liberty secure.

In my childhood, we eagerly anticipated the Fourth of July. The children went to bed on the night of the third, and the town was like any other town, plain, and pro- saic. But when we awoke in the morning, to the boom of cannons nearby, or the long soft rolling thunder of guns in the distance, lo! flags were floating everywhere, and houses, spires, schools were in bloom with brave, bright color. The drums were beating and the bugles were blowing. Soldiers marched in procession. So did the boys and girls: the girls in white frocks with bright sashes; the boys in white trousers, with blue coats and gilt buttons. We all wore our red, white and blue rosettes. We heard the Declaration read in a so- norous voice by some magnate. Ministers prayed, orators spoke. We sang till the clouds in the blue sky seemed to shake with the choral strains. We ended with "Praise God from whom All Blessings Flow." And the children of to-day could not be better taught, nor more admirably trained than by a similar course of pro- ceedings now. To stimulate patriotism should be part of every parent's, of every teacher's duty, and I rejoice as I see the flag flying from the school-house the land over; I rejoice whenever I hear fresh young voices upraised for God and liberty.

A Castaway Redeemed.

Many striking testimonies are given at the nightly Gospel meetings in the Bow- ery Mission, New York. One evening lately, a young man recently converted gave the following testimony: "My wife on her death-bed made me promise to meet her in heaven. After her death I began to drink and wandered far away from God. I had often read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the Bowery Mis- sion, and I left my home determined to come here and give myself to God. The testimonies at the Mission made me more earnest, and when the invitation was given the thought of my promise to my dear wife urged me forward to the mercy seat.

and kneeling I cried to God for help and strength and power to overcome. I was delivered and have now been kept for three months. My father is a deacon in our church. I managed to keep from him the fact of my drinking; but he is rejoic- ing with me to-night because of my restor- ation to God and my church duties."

SAVING THE TENEMENT CHILDREN.

Mont-Lawn Home Crowded with Little Weaklings from the Hot City Tenements—Hunch-backed Johnny's First Outing—The Boy who had "Never Seen the Country"—How the Golden Mid-summer Days Pass at our Children's Home.

ON the third floor of a dingy rear tenement in East 75th St., New York, lives John M., a little, deformed boy with his aged grandmother. Johnny's father, mother and grandfather are all dead and the wee, humpbacked lad and the old woman have been left to fight the hard battle of life alone—a strangely assorted pair. Life in that rear tenement home has none of the sweetness and joy and sunshine that are found in happier households, where the parents have been spared to their children. Yet the old grandmother buckles to it with a stout heart and by doing jobs of house-cleaning and "day's work," she contrives to earn enough to "keep the life in" herself and her dead daughter's child, but a full meal or a bountiful table are things the little fellow never sees. He sometimes thinks the old grandmother harsh, because she seems unkind to him and would probably be glad to have him safely provided for elsewhere; but the hunchback, with his pale face and sunken cheeks, is not big enough to realize the terrible struggle the old woman has had all these years. Such struggles end in pauperism and the City Field. It was by all odds on the most unfortunate day of Johnny's life when he met one of our good station, where he sat down to wait. There the good missionary found him seven and a half hours afterward, and he greeted her with a smile that showed he had all along had implicit faith in her coming. She brought him with the others to the Bible House, and having no idea of green fields and trees and waving grasses, he thought he had already reached the country. He was nearly famished, and one of the clerks generously gave him her own lunch which he swallowed in big mouthfuls, making appreciative remarks between the bites. In the afternoon, he sailed up the lordly Hudson on the steamer Chrystenah with the other children, and his eyes opened wide in wonder and admiration at the sights. Everything was a revelation to this little lad, whose life had been cooped up within brick walls and in hot alleys and court-yards. And when the wagons with the new arrivals drew up before the Home, and the other children ran out to give them welcome, the wee hunchback stood mute with amazement—it was a fairy-land, all so new and wonderful. Several days passed before he became quite accustomed to his surroundings. This poor, lame little boy is a type of hundreds of others who, in the course of the present summer, will be sheltered, fed and cared for by Matron Collins and her staff at Mont-Lawn.

Miss Helen Collins, the Matron of our Children's Home, and who now is serving her second summer in that capacity, is a trained missionary of six years' experience. She has been actively identified with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its charitable work for the last five years. The Matron's staff is a most efficient corps of young women of Christian character, superior education, and practical training in philanthropic work. Several have already been with us in previous seasons, while others are now passing their first summer at beautiful Mont-Lawn. Miss Emma Weidenkoff of Cleveland, O., is now in her second season at Mont-Lawn. Miss Jessie Thomas is a New Yorker by birth and has served two seasons at the Children's Home. The same is true of Miss Lizzie Silvernagle of missionaries, who was engaged in caring out the neediest slum children at Mont-Lawn. His poor pinched and misshapen body appealed to her sympathy, and he was soon booked for a ten days' outing. To his amazement, his old grandmother consented, and was arranged that he should be taken down town to the Bible House by the missionary next afternoon at 6 o'clock with a party of other children. That night the little hunchback hardly slept. He was anxious to go to the country—that mysterious place of which he had heard the children speak, but had never seen with his own eyes—that he left home as he was dressed, at 6 A. M., and found his way to the elevated railway

Brooklyn. Miss Lillian Drane is a public school teacher, of eleven years' experience, and is also in her second missionary season. Some of the new members of the staff are graduates of training schools, and several intend to take up the life-work of a missionary in foreign lands. They are Miss Myrtle Higgins, a relative of Mr. Dwight L. Moody, the celebrated evangelist and now a student of the Moody Institute at Northfield, Mass.; Miss Cora Holmes, of Lockhaven, Pa.; Miss Isabel Trowbridge, a student of Vassar College and a member of the famous missionary family of which the late Rev. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

Inquirer, Paterson, N. J. 1. To whom can I send verses to have music set to them, so that they will be inserted in the hymn books? 2. Are there any correspondence schools for training young men to become clergymen?

1. Almost any composer will do such work, if the hymns are good. Prices range from $3 to $10. 2. Write to Rev. Dr. Torrey, Moody Institute, Chicago.

Subscriber, Boise City, Va. 1. Do you think a telegraph operator will be held accountable for working on Sundays when, if he had his wish, he would not do so? 2. Do you think it right for a gentleman to call on a young lady Sunday—that is if they are engaged and are very much attached to each other?

1. Your own conscience must decide whether the Sunday work is an actual necessity, and whether it so interferes with your exercise of church and other privileges peculiar to the day, that you would be justified in changing. An outsider cannot advise in such matters. We do not believe in Sunday work; yet we must recognize that certain classes of work may be indispensable as society is now constituted. 2. Merely social calls we should regard as out of place on that day. A call for the purpose of accompanying to church is a different matter.

G. E. B. What is a person to do who has led a wicked life, but has been forgiven through Christ, if he is still troubled by remorse?

Bear the remorse until by God's grace a happier state of mind is produced. You remember that significant record (Mark 14: 72) about Peter's denial of Christ: "When he thought thereon he wept." When you rejoice over sin forgiven, and are overcome with wonder and gratitude at God's magnanimity in forgiving you, it is quite natural and proper that you should grieve that you had ever offended a Being so good and kind. The forgiveness should lead you to love God more than others do, and to rejoice in his marvelous goodness and mercy. It should also lead you to be very watchful against relapsing into sin, and to make great exertions to render service to One who has forgiven you. You should also be very tender and charitable toward others. Do not let remorse incapacitate you for labor, but rather operate as an incentive to service.

J. J. A. Ellenville, N. Y. Is it right for a Christian who has a fair business to add to this a summer boarding-house by which he is deprived of a good deal of his Sabbath and weekly church privileges, being busy most all the while Sundays attending to the wants of his guests?

There must be boarding-houses, and people must eat Sundays as well as week-days; so this being the case, we think it much more desirable that such places should be conducted by Christians, than by non-Christians. Besides being a positive advantage to the boarder, in a moral sense, it affords the conductor a rare opportunity of carrying his Christian principles into practice in a new field. There are places (like Ocean Grove and others), where such businesses are carried on without the slightest interference with the exercise of anyone's church privileges.

A. J. H. Janney, W. I. Should you see one who is a member of the Gospel drinking intemperately, and it has been a known fact for years), should it be wrong for any conscientious member to draw him out on that account?

Such a case should be dealt with by your session or Presbytery. It is hardly possible that any spiritual light can result from ministrations conducted under such conditions, leaving the church to be thought of only when it is necessary to effect a change, including the prayers, prayers, and remembrance of church officers and people, have failed.

S. P. Baltimore, Md. 1. Is it permissible for a pastor, father or father-in-law to appropriate the ideas of another, even though he clothe them in his own language? 2. How far may one borrow in writing the language or ideas of another without being open to the charge of plagiarism?

1. Whoever the same language is employed credit should be given to the original author. There is no exclusive proprietorship in ideas, but were a speaker to bodily appropriate the line of argument of another, even though he varied the language, he would certainly make himself liable to the charge of plagiarism. 2. This is a question for a literary jury to decide. Shakespeare borrowed and adapted much, and so also did almost every distinguished author, as far as known, including the poets, from Homer down. They took older compositions and imbued them with new artistic life and meaning. The rule seems to have been in such cases, that if a writer improved upon his original, the charge of plagiarism did not lie.

R. A. I., Santa Barbara, Cal. I have read with a great deal of interest the articles published in your excellent paper in regard to "Mormonism." There are at present about five hundred Elders of the Mormon Church, going up and down our beautiful State, trying to convert us to Mormonism. There are two here and they are working hard to prove that they are right and everybody else is wrong. When they called on us, we referred them to the articles published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Dec. 23, '96; Jan. 20, '97; Feb. 3, and Feb. 14, opposition to the warnings of conscience, and with the delusive idea that they can be repented of afterward, when God will surely pardon them. Among presumptuous sins may be enumerated these: to profess religion without principle; to ask God's blessing and yet go on in sinful living; to search out and run into temptation; to be self-confident and complacent concerning one's spiritual condition, though no effort has been made to set the heart right with God, and to arraign the goodness and justice of the Almighty, instead of finding in our own sinful hearts the cause of our misfortunes. Persistent drunkenness, profanity, Sabbath-breaking, and licentiousness are properly classed as presumptuous sins, when the sinner is one who knows the law and willfully violates it, excusing his offense on the ground that God is too good and kind to punish such doings on the part of his mortal children.

S. L. R., Society Hill, S. C. What does it cost to send money to India? It is rumored that it takes nine-tenths to deliver one-tenth.

If the money is sent by mail, the only expense would be the trifling percentage charged by the banking firm for converting dollars into rupees. If sent by cable, it costs considerably more, but on sums of over $1,000, such expense would not exceed one cent on a dollar, so that at least ninety-nine cents would be delivered in India for every dollar transferred. In the matter of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD India Relief Fund, we pay all expenses involved in the cabling or transferring of the money, and for every dollar which we send to the missionaries, or to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD International Committee, (under the Chairmanship of Bishop Thoburn), the full equivalent in rupees, without any deduction whatever for cable charges or exchange or

Such give us the real heartfelt joy that springs from giving, where the gift means salvation to the giver feels the draft upon his own resources gives gladly and confidently, knowing God loveth the "cheerful giver." We feel the need, we believe it to be the duty of a Christian man or woman to aid in the hands of our devoted missionaries working there. Your question may be answered by referring to Prov. 11: 24, 25; Lul. Ps. 112: 9; Prov. 14: 21; Col. 3: 14; 7; Prov. 21: 13, and like passages.

George A. F., Hawkesville, Ont. What is the statement that Asa hated God?

The proposed "Greater Republic of America" is the projected union of Malaya, San Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Costa Rica. The last-named State, is not yet fully won over to the States. There is no central capital of this States.

M. A. S., Evanston, Ill. How can you make the statement that Asa hated God? (1. Kings 15: 14), the heart was perfect with the Lord all

You must remember that Asa had been reproved for taking matters in his hand and showing distrust of God (Chron. 16: 7-10), and had been with the prophet who reproved him in prison and punishing others. He repeated his fault in his sickness, and we know the kind of physician he consulted, we should understand why he was angry with him. As the prophet to the first instance, he of all men, had look to God in an emergency, as God to his rescue in a sore straits, the king showed proof justifies the statement that he hated God, though in 1 years he had done some good things. The writers of Kings and Kings were doubtless to him for these things in courtly fashion praised his good he had done, and of the evil.

R., Canandaigua, N. Y. 1. Paul's meaning in referring to people eating and drinking? 2. Was the instruction the Lord's Supper a command? Was Luke present at the institution of the Lord's Supper?

1. There seems to be some disorder in the church. We gather that the offices of the clubs and societies become mixed with the ordinances. Rich men were their own bread and wine claiming precedence over poorer brethren. Paul tried to satisfy their physical appetites at home and not come to the table with animal, but with spiritual desires. 2. Paul reminds these verses the circumstances of the institution of the ordinance his words are generally this day as the most suitable of liturgical administration these he adds a warning hypocritical profession, and no others. What anyone else to join in a specially designed to commemorate Christ's death? If you were a memorial service for loved father, would you not consider outrage for a person to intrude who had spiced and neglected that father all his life? No; only the Apostles were present. Luke was not an apostle.

A HIGH-CASTE FAMILY OF CEYLONESE NOTABLES.

This photograph represents a family group of a noble Kandian house, the male members being hereditary chiefs of the Singhalese. Their religion is Buddhism. It will be noted that while the women dress like their native sisters in India, the men wear a very peculiar costume; among the oddities of which may be mentioned wide "bishop" sleeves, remarkable head-dresses, and combs of silver and tortoise-shell in their hair, which is worn long and rounded up behind, somewhat after the fashion of a Chinaman's queue. No woman is allowed to wear a comb in her hair among these people, that privilege being monopolized by the other sex exclusively.

also June 2. They said that they were not correct, and were not true at all in regard to their belief. They said that did not teach polygamy, etc. If the statements in your paper are true, these men are the greatest hypocrites I ever met, but they seem very fair indeed and stick close to the Bible and there is but very little difference in their views of religion as set forth by the Bible and our own. The only difference I can find in conversation with them is their Latter Day Prophets, and the laying on of hands after baptism for the reception of the Holy Spirit. Of course they believe in the Book of Mormon but that comes from their prophets.

You need be under no apprehension as to the entire accuracy of the articles published. Their author is Gen. John Eaton, a prominent Government official and educator and for many years resident in Utah in an official capacity. He may be addressed at the Concord, Washington, D. C.

Mrs. J. C. C., Petitcodiac, N. B. Can. What does the Psalmist mean by "presumptuous sins" in Ps. 19: 13?

Presumption, when having reference to conduct or moral action, implies arrogance or irreverence. When it relates to religion in general, it means a bold and daring confidence in God's goodness, without obedience to his will. Presumptuous sins must not be confounded with sins of infirmity, or ignorance, or of sudden temptation. They are sins committed and repeated in violation of a known law, done with knowledge and deliberation, in

W. B. R., Perkasee, Pa. What became of Pontius Pilate after he had given Jesus Christ into the hands of his enemies to be crucified?

Josephus, the Jewish historian (in his Antiquities, book 18, chap. 4, sec. 1.) relates how he persecuted and defeated the Samaritans, and they complained to Vitellius, governor of Syria, who sent Pilate to Rome to appear before Caesar. Eusebius adds that Pilate soon afterward, wearied with misfortunes, killed himself. There are various traditions as to his death. One is that he was banished to a northern province, and there died; another that he became a recluse on Mount Pilatus, and in despair plunged into the lake.

Earnest Inquirer, Shelton, Conn. What do you think the Judge of all the earth will say to the man who pays two dollars a week for cigars and gives five cents to starving India?

We would not condemn, but rather commiserate such a case. Such spiritual blindness (to say nothing of the lack of human feeling) is pitiful indeed, and would seem to show that the first rudiments of the Christian character—mutual helpfulness, love of our fellow-men—were hardly yet understood. There are many people who, from their youth up, seem to have been accustomed to giving to God's work just as little as possible—a petty coin

Then e are other enjoyments, farther afield, the youngsters go botanizing or leaf ing, under the guidance of some eter of the staff, who can tell them all the flowers and leaves they are pick- g. And such posies as the girls can in the Mont-Lawn woodlands! The city children—some of whom, at e have never been in the country in all the little lives—however widely their st may differ on other things, are all in their passionate love of flowers, re armfuls of daisies, buttercups and en with here and there a bunch of wild s or tiny forget-me-nots, or perhaps a elated wood-violets, are to them re beyond all price.

The fare is in but wholesome and nourishing. eggs. Dinner is served at noon and consists of meat, potatoes, sweet corn or other vegetables, pie or pudding and bread. At six o'clock supper is served with plenty of bread and good, rich milk. Appetites are always sharp, and the clatter of knives, forks, and spoons, is fairly outdone by the incessant chatter of our little guests as they eat their meals. Yet all are exceedingly well-behaved. After the "grace before meat," which is sung by all in unison and with right goodwill, the meal proceeds, and the viands are consumed with a relish that would make a dyspeptic envious. Good food, good air, plenty of exercise and amusement, and sweet, unbroken sleep, work wonders with the slim, pale-faced little tenement tots, who come to the Home. Long before their outing is ended, the glow of health tinges their cheeks and their little, puny frames are filled with new life and vigor.

One of the pleasures to which our little folks look forward with eager anticipation is a wagon ride. These occur daily, and the big Home wagonette, supplemented usually by a second vehicle, is filled with laughing youngsters, who are driven off some half a dozen miles or more still farther away among the Rockland hills. Each child has at least two such rides during his ten days' stay at Mont-Lawn, in addition to the ride to and from the dock when arriving at the Home and departing.

At the present writing, there are in the neighborhood of two hundred little guests at Mont-Lawn, and fresh arrivals are coming almost daily, while others, having ended their outing, are being returned to their homes in the city.

We would remind our readers that this worthy charity, to which they have contributed in past seasons, is dependent largely upon voluntary gifts for the success of its efforts among the poor children of the slums. Three dollars cover the entire cost of an outing for a little tenement boy or girl, including expense of transportation to and from the Home, and food, shelter, medical attention, and all incidentals while there. To be able to bring a ray of real sunshine into the heart of some of these forlorn little ones—"God's poor"—is a privilege which, when availed of in the Christian spirit, results in blessing to both. We invite the co-operation of our friends in this midsummer benevolence, which in past years has brought joy to thousands of sad little souls and brightened lives that were all too dark and gloomy. Precious memories of these golden summer days and of the kind treatment experienced at Mont-Lawn, will last through the lifetime of many a child, and the Gospel teachings at the Home may, under divine blessing, be made the means of transforming many young lives, and making of these waifs noble Christian men and women.

BELIEF IN CHRIST.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning July 18. John 4: 46-53; Acts 16: 25-34.

Human ideas of the adequacy of a remedy for any given malady or affliction are not always reliable. We can imagine the jailer, in the second of the two passages associated with the topic (Acts 16: 25-34), being disappointed with Paul's answer to his question: "What must I do to be saved?" He was not required to do, but to believe. This way of attaining salvation, is seldom satisfactory to any one at first sight. Whether the salvation to be gained be salvation from the penalty of sin, or from its power, or from its taint, the inadequacy of the remedy appears glaring. It would seem much more reasonable for the sinner to suffer something, or do some meritorious work, that he may win salvation and, to some extent, purchase it. Like Naaman, he turns away from the remedy with the conviction that it cannot be effectual. But is it so inadequate a remedy as it appears? Apart from the fact that it is the divinely appointed way of salvation and as such to be accepted by sinners without criticism, it commends itself on examination and on practical experiment, to our reason. We find that it is true that, "as a man thinketh in his heart so is he." Belief can do more to transform life than action. We know how it is in our own experience. A mother sending her boy to the great city to live, knows that his obedience to her, his regular attendance at case. The man who believes in a person, or in a principle, is worth more in a political campaign, than a more eloquent hired speaker, who has no convictions. Belief inspires a man, holds him true, makes him consistent, gives him energy, makes him self-sacrificing. It is no unimportant matter. Then, on the other side, when we look at the character of Christ, think of his divine purity, his hatred of sin, his scorn of hypocrisy, his tenderness to the erring, his patience and forbearance, and ask ourselves what belief in such a Being implies, we see how much it means. It does not seem so unreasonable to hear that if we believe on him we shall be saved. Belief on him will make us like him, and being like him we shall be saved from impurity, from selfishness, and shall be worth saving eternally. The fact has been proved again and again in the experience of Christian ministers and workers. After appeals to the reason of men have failed, after a man has shown himself impervious to all considerations, as to his own ruin, or to natural affection, and he continues in sin reckless of all consequences to himself and to his family, the preaching of Christ has moved him and faith in Christ has transformed his life. To those who believe, Christ has proved the power of God and the wisdom of God.

Our Royal Siamese Visitors.

EUROPEAN governments are preparing to give gracious welcome to his Majesty, the King of Siam, who is now on his way to visit several of the capitals. Before leaving their own country, the King and Queen together performed the ceremony of opening the first section of the Korat Railway, which has recently been completed between Bangkok, the Capital, and Ayuthia. It was built by English contractors and is one of the most important lines of Siam's growing railway system. The first sod of the Korat Railway was cut by the King in March, 1892, and the first section measures about four and one-half miles. The opening of this section by the King and Queen was made the occasion of much pomp and heathen ceremony. Bangkok was crowded, and there was a lavish display of decorations. On their arrival at the Bangkok terminus the King and Queen proceeded to the Royal pavilion which had been erected. There the King lit the long wax candles on the altar, and having bowed to the Buddhist priests, proceeded to the rails to fit the spikes and bolts. As he began to drive the spikes the priests chanted the prayers usually recited at State ceremonies. The King drove in two spikes and fastened bolts at the end of the rails, using for the purpose a gold hammer with an ivory handle and a gold spanner with a handle covered with velvet. The Queen then went to the other end of the rail, and was also handed a set of implements, which she used in the same manner.

church and Sunday School afford no grounds for hope that he will be protected from the temptations that will surround him. But if the boy really believes in Christ and the truths of Christianity, she is at peace. The most blameless life counts for little in comparison with sincere faith. It is so in other matters. CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR'S HOSTS.

A mighty Gathering Representing Nearly Fifty Thousand Societies of many Nationalities and Aggregating Nearly Three Million Members.

and from foreign lands, delegates are speeding toward the rendezvous. Four hundred are expected from New York, about the same number from New Jersey, about eight hundred from the Pennsylvania section, while Western States will furnish large delegations. The preliminary notices sent to San Francisco, to the extent of accommodations required by the various States, it appears probable that the convention of 1897 will not be any of its five predecessors in numbers. Many, of course, in the various States have been in the habit of attending the Convention of former years, and will be unable to spare the money for the journey to San Francisco; but the places will doubtless be filled by Christian Endeavorers in the West who hitherto have not been able to attend the Boston and New York conventions. Arrangements for the reception of the expected guests have been progressing more than a year, the San Francisco people being hospitably intent on giving their friends a hearty welcome. It is not an easy matter to receive and entertain from twenty to thirty thousand guests, who are about the number of the delegates at recent Conventions. The committees, however, have planned carefully, foreseeing every contingency likely to arise, and are not afraid of more coming than they can comfortably provide for. The plans for State Headquarters are different from those adopted at any previous Christian Endeavor Convention. The Mechanics Pavilion, which will be one of the principal meeting places, will be the location of all State Headquarters as well. The States have been grouped together in the location of headquarters and each group of States will be the guest of a group of societies.

Upon the arrival of delegates at the San Francisco ferries, they will be escorted by the Reception Committee direct to the Mechanics' Pavilion, where they will register at their State Headquarters. They will then be escorted to their hotels.

The California Headquarters, which will occupy all the north and part of the east gallery of the Pavilion, will be splendidly decorated throughout the Convention. Here, in the intervals of the meetings, receptions will be tendered each day by the California State Union to visiting States.

Two large pavilions have been secured for the meetings. By holding them simultaneously and providing equal attractions the crowd will be divided and none will be disappointed. Mechanics' Pavilion is so large that speakers could with difficulty make themselves heard; but its dimensions have been reduced by partitioning off part of its space for committee rooms, leaving accommodation for about nine thousand persons. Woodward's Pavilion will hold about seven thousand more.

The programme for the Convention promises to be one of the best ever provided. Its chief features are as follows:

The Convention will open on Wednesday night, July 7th, with meetings in eight of the largest churches of San Francisco and one meeting each in Oakland and Alameda. The topic for these meetings is, "The Life Filled with the Spirit."

and twenty or more of the churches of San Francisco will be used for these important meetings. On Thursday evening the general topic of Christian citizenship will be presented in addresses upon the following subjects: "Christian Endeavor and the Saloon," "Christian Endeavor and Social Purity," "Christian Endeavor and Sabbath Observance," "Christian Endeavor and Political Righteousness," "Christian Endeavor and Good Literature."

On Friday morning the programme provides for practical addresses and open parliaments on fundamental principles of Christian Endeavor. In Woodward's Pavilion the general topic will be, "Loyalty to the Church." In the Mechanics' Pavilion the following topics will be considered in addresses by practical men: "Christian Endeavor Extension in Country Districts," "Christian Endeavor Extension in Large Cities," to be followed by a symposium on "The Essentials of a Model Christian Endeavor Society." On Friday evening the general subject will be, "Christian Endeavor Fellowship."

On Saturday morning, in Woodward's Pavilion, the State secretaries are to be heard from in a symposium on the topic, "How May We Make the Committee Work in Local Societies More Effective?" In the Mechanics' Pavilion, State presisessions at the two auditoriums, the Endeavorers will proceed to Van Ness avenue, where an open air demonstration will take place. Four speakers' stands will be erected, one in each of four connecting blocks.

On Sunday the Endeavorers will attend the regular church services, and the pulpits will be occupied by visiting clergymen.

In the afternoon there will be three meetings of great importance—in the Mechanics' Building an evangelistic meeting for men only, to be addressed by evangelists and ministers; in Woodward's Pavilion a meeting for women only; in the First Congregational Church a meeting for ministers and church officers, for the deepening of the spiritual life. In the evening will be the regular Christian Endeavor prayer meetings, to be followed by the preaching services in all the churches, addresses to be delivered by visiting delegates. Special care is being taken in arranging for these meetings.

On Monday morning the time will be given to the evangelistic and missionary influences of Christian Endeavor. There will be addresses upon the following topics: "Home Missions," "Foreign Missions," "Systematic and Proportionate Giving to God," "City Evangelization," "The Claims of the Ministry Upon Young Men." The afternoon will be given up to a second "school of methods." Never before have two afternoons been given over to committee conferences. It is done this year so that all the various committees' methods may be carefully discussed and that such advance movements as the possibilities of the Juniors, the Intermediate, the Mothers', the Senior societies may be brought before the delegates. At these times the work among the sailors and soldiers, light-house keepers and life-savers will be thoroughly presented. The Junior rally will be held on Monday afternoon in the Mechanics' Pavilion. The closing sessions of the Convention will be held on Monday night in the Mechanics' Pavilion and Woodward's Pavilion. Rev. George F. Pentecost, D.D., will preach one of the Convention sermons, and President Clark and Secretary Baer will preside and conduct the closing consecration meetings.

Home Talks with Mothers and Daughters.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

FAMILY LOYALTY.

QUITE apart from household love, which is taken for granted in every family, is a certain quality of loyalty which holds kith and kin together. While human nature is what it is we need never expect that people of the same family living together in the intimacy of home will always escape friction and irritation. The very candor and unreserve of home life leads people to speak hastily, puts a check upon politeness, and has as its result domestic jars. They are to be regretted and even deplored, for it is a strange weakness of human nature which makes possible the seamy side in so many of our closest relationships. Brothers and sisters are very apt not only to see faults in each other, but to speak of them plainly. Even mothers and daughters do not always live in perfect amity and agreement, and in the most affectionate households there will now and then be a little breeze of ill temper or a break in the perfect harmony.

All this, however, may go on and yet may be pardoned if there is a high ideal of loyalty which leads those of one blood to stand firmly for each other in the face of the world. The old proverb has it that "blood is thicker than water," which being translated simply means that those of a family or clan are bound by their relationship to make common cause against all outside disturbers of their peace and stand firmly together for the one roof tree.

A high ideal of family loyalty will preserve us from ever telling disagreeable family secrets. If there is some member of the household who yields to temptation or whose ways are trying, the rest are bound to conceal his faults so far as they may from those beyond their gates. To speak of the faults of a person's own family, or of any member in public, is to do a decidedly ungenerous as well as underbred thing. We ought to maintain the family honor, and to defend everyone belonging to us with all the power we possess.

The greatest tenderness should exist in our minds with regard to the impression our dear ones make on those who know them but slightly. Great injustice is done to children by the thoughtless retailing of their faults to outsiders by persons within the home. I have known an instance in which a young man arriving at full age has been embarrassed and hindered from securing a good position in business simply through thoughtless speeches made about him in a somewhat irresponsible childhood—made, too, by a member of his own family. A child may pass through a phase of untruthfulness, of jealousy, possibly of dishonesty, and yet outgrow those faults and if properly trained and treated reach a useful manhood. But the fact that his family have bruited his errors far and wide will act very unfavorably in his case.

There may of course arise occasions when it is necessary to tell the absolute truth about people, even those belonging to us, but ordinarily the mantle of silence and of charity should be thrown over all failings so far as the world outside is concerned.

One sometimes sees in a family a queer streak of loyalty towards one member. Sometimes the mother, again the father, again a brother or sister is the object of passionate devotion on the part of all, and whatever this favored one may do he or she is quite safe and may expect to have the best construction put on everything and the best treatment in the eyes of everybody. Singularly, it is not always the sweet and amiable person who is thus selected as the object of loyal love. Ill temper is quite often at a premium in this world, and you will find that the one in the family who really rules is the one whom it is rather unsafe to stir up, because she will make it very uncomfortable for the others if she does not have her own way. This is all wrong, and should not be for a moment tolerated, but while homes are what they are we shall find that the most aggressive personality in the family is the one which carries all before it.

Sometimes there is one person in a set of brothers and sisters who seems fated never to get on, through some incapacity or eccentricity. While others succeed he always slips a little way back and never is able to secure that safe foothold which means in the end success and substantial advancement. Let the others rally round such a one and help him to the utmost extent of their ability. The family bond demands this. The family bond demands, too, that every member of the circle shall be insured so far as possible against unkind criticism; that one shall never be ashamed of one's own flesh and blood; that one, on the contrary, shall always to the end of time uphold the family honor.

Should it chance that some member of the family makes an unfortunate marriage—and this happens sometimes—the fact being accomplished the wise and judicious way is to adopt the new member into the clan, not making a break, nor holding aloof, nor in any way showing one's distaste for the new relationship. This is a hard doctrine and many do not

Three Months Waiting for Harvest Still to be Borne—Can the Stricken, Suffering Survive?—The Testimony of Missionary Eye-Witnesses.

HOPEFUL as are the reports of harvest prospects, which come from famine-stricken India, it is evident that the missionaries and philanthropists dread the crisis which must come before the harvest can be gathered. The number of sufferers increases daily, recruited from classes which had some savings on which they had lived hitherto. These savings are now exhausted by the long pressure of famine prices, and now the well-to-do classes are timidly and reluctantly asking for help. They shrink from applying to the government, knowing that it will offer them nothing but toil of a kind peculiarly offensive to a self-respecting native, and in associations that to them are worse than death. The missionaries know of multitudes of such cases, and many of them are in Christian homes. These have a strong claim upon them, and the missionaries feel it incumbent to help them and do it with more pleasure than they feel in relieving the improvident class. It will be very gratifying to our readers to realize that through their liberality, the American missionaries have the means of engaging in this Christ-like work. The forty thousand dollars now being distributed by our missionary committee, will aid many of these sufferers very great, and though the Government working wisely and earnestly, it is to reach all who require aid. I have seen famine sufferers in British and native territory and can assure you that the money we can send them, sands are dying and there is no possibility of a harvest until September or October.

"You are wise in distributing through missionaries, since there have been sad cases of fraud at Government relief camps in spite of the watch of Government officials. The missionaries and native Christians will see distribution of funds personally and demonstrate to the sufferers that the Father of Christ are interested in the bodies as well as the souls of men. There has not had such an opportunity in the past to reach India with the Gospel, faithful now we shall soon reap a harvest of souls.

Yours in Christ's Service
ROBERT P. WILSON

Rev. C. Harding, the American missionary at Sholapur, writes:

The blessing of many who are ready will certainly come upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and upon those who have sent such donations to India through your agency.

In the great famine twenty years ago, works were delayed until multitudes were dead and too far gone to be brought back to life, as I remember those days, like a nightmare, for the dead and dying were everywhere. The government now is wiser and more humane, at least in our region, for in the present, relief works were opened as soon as distress began, and thus in the Sholapur district more than 100,000 people have been kept some months past. Many of these are now doing such work as is now offered to them in the exposure in the hot sun, with the temperature frequently at 110 degrees, and the extra night of bringing water and fuel, often for a distance, and of grinding the grain for bread—all these things are telling upon the health of these people. And since most of the work will be closed early in June, if the rains come, it seems certain that a time of suffering is just upon us, and I expect to spend some of my time during the next three months in cases of extreme want.

The earnings on the relief works are sufficient for daily food, and we have given the money sent us for clothing, where it is needed. Others who have work which they leave, and which only partly supports their families, are helping to a small extent, and thus they live. Besides these, there are about two of our Christians in a native State eight miles from Sholapur, and the native Government supplies no relief work for the famine-stricken Christians naturally look to us for help. It is a great joy that we, through your agency, are able to supply their needs. I intend to visit these Christians shortly, and I am sure that the knowledge that kindred hearts ten thousand miles away have been moved to send them relief will awaken their gratitude. And those who have given so liberally to this fund will hear the words of the Master, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Mrs. Carrie P. Bruere, of Coonoor, tells the following history of some of the sufferers she is sheltering:

A boy of the farmer caste, aged about years. Before the famine, his parents were well-to-do, as they owned cattle. The famine came, and this boy with his father and mother were obliged to go out begging for food. The father became reduced to a skeleton and died. The mother, who was weak and old, died after eating leaves and fruit of the trees. The boy then tried to steal grain, but was caught. Through the kindness of some man he was released and sent to me.

Another boy belongs to the shoemaker caste, about seven. His father died in his home. One of the sons ran away, and this boy was brought by the mother and given to me. The boy says his mother is dead. He asked how he knew, he says, "Because I have not seen her since." A third boy, about six years old, lost his father and mother. Both died of starvation. When he came to us he had been found on the streets. A fourth belongs to the shoemaker caste. He is nine years old. He died of starvation, when his father died and his brother and sister. The sister brother to some Sahib. He was sent from Mahabulnagar, Central Provinces. These are specimens of the thousands of all are much the same. Most lost both father and mother.

Rev. J. O. Denning, Narsingpur, writes: Thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for their donations. May the Lord bless them! I expect to put a part of the money in relief and part on the care of orphans. I think it agreeable to the friends who sent it. I am acquainted with Dr. R. G. Hobbs, of India with corn. I hope he will use the money that can be sent us will be need various objects of relief.

Rev. J. Lampard, writing from Tal, on May 13, says:

The famine increases in severity as time goes on. I believe that between three and four million are receiving Government relief. Sickeningly increasing. The short water supply is causing outbreaks of cholera, especially on relief works. Large numbers are gathered together and aggregate very large numbers of people dying weekly.

accept it. Probably more family feuds occur through discontent with the new element brought into this connection than in any other way.

In the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love.

and this all-round fancy may very easily fall upon some girl whom his mother would not have chosen for the youth. The old cry of Rebecca, "I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth," is repeated over and over again in our modern lives. But after all a man chooses his wife for himself and not to please his mother and his sisters, and if he have arrived at full age—and equally if a daughter being of age, decides on a certain man for her husband—both son and daughter must be allowed to act according to individual judgment, and the courses they pursue should not be allowed to bring alienation and discord into the family circle. Mr. Stowe used to tell of an old deacon who said that he had assured his wife once for all that he loved her, and therefore there was no need of his ever repeating it. We are all better for being told over and over again that we are loved by those who are around us, and the home in which there is no demonstration but only icy reserve and an absence of tender words and caresses is a very desolate place.

On this page we give a picture of a scene in Simla, the summer resort of the official and wealthy classes which at this time of the year is crowded by a society beyond the reach of famines. It should be said to their honor that in this time of trouble, they have given both in money and in personal labor with unprecedented liberality for the relief of the afflicted people.

On the next page are a number of photographs recently received from our missionary almoners, every one taken during the past three months. They refute, as the camera only can refute, the wicked stories which have been circulated by people who sought to find excuse for not helping to relieve the fearful suffering. The pinched faces, the bare bones and the distended stomachs of people who, to allay the pangs of hunger, have eaten earth and weeds which they could not digest, tell their sad story with a force beyond the possibility of contradiction. To these we add the following letters from Christian men who have been eye-witnesses of the suffering:

MISSIONARY PHOTOGRAPHS OF THE FAMINE SUFFERERS OF INDIA.

The realistic productions of the camera are the answer of the devoted American missionaries to those critics at home who have charged them with exaggeration, and who have denied the existence of famine in India. These glimpses of suffering justify all the sympathy and help that have come from Christian America. We have reproduced only a few of many photographs of the same tragic character received by late mails. The scenes depicted above are: 1. Newly arrived famine children at the Meerut School. 2. Famine children at Meerut. 3. Some of the Meerut children after being cared for. 4. Famine children at the M. E. Mission Orphanage, Allahabad. 5. A pitiful group from Bilaspur. 6. More famine objects at Bilaspur. 7. In the last stages of famine. 8. Famine adults and children. 9. A sufferer supported by Salvation Army officers (too weak to stand to be photographed).

Hawaii and Cuba.

WE hate jingoism and spirit of conquest, but annexation we believe in. Our United States Government has two big pockets not yet filled. The Sandwich Islands may be put into the one and Cuba in the other. The time will come, perhaps not this year, perhaps not next year, but nothing can hinder the consummation. Cuba was once a part of this Continent and was snapped off by a great convulsion of nature. By great political convulsion it may again become a part of us. The prominent men of Hawaii are the sons of American missionaries. That which was planted by those missionary ancestors is now coming up. The four million dollars of indebtedness we assume will be of little importance compared with the hundreds of millions of value annexed.

No one who has not visited them can appreciate the luxuriance of those islands. Enough palm leaves to crown all the world's victors, enough sugar to sweeten all the world's beverages, enough bananas to pile all the world's fruit-baskets, enough cocoa-nuts to powder all the world's cake, enough pomegranate to crimson all the world's hedges, enough flowers to garland all the world's beauty. We do not invite the Sandwich Islands or Cuba to become a part of this nation, but when they knock at our door let us in good Christian neighborhood say, "Come in!"

Preliminaries.

BY common consent the exercises in the churches going before the sermon are called "preliminaries." The dictionary says that a "preliminary" is that which precedes the main business. We do not think the sermon ought to be considered the main business. When a pastor at the beginning of the first prayer says, "O God," he has entered upon the most important duty of the service. We would not depreciate the sermon, but we plead for more attention to the "preliminaries." If a minister cannot get the attention of the people for prayer or Bible-reading it is his own fault. Much of the interest of a service depends upon how it is launched. The "preliminaries," are, for the most part, the time in which people in church examine their neighbors' robes. Milliners and tailors get the advantage of the first three-quarters of an hour. The "preliminaries" are the time in which to scrutinize the fresco, and look round to see who is there, and get yourself generally fixed.

This idea is fostered by some elocutionary professors who would have the minister take the earlier exercises of the occasion to get his voice in tune. You must not speak out first. It is to be a private interview between you and heaven. The people will listen to the low grumble, and think it must be very good if they could only hear it. As for ourselves, we refuse to put down our head in public prayer until we find out whether or not we are going to be able to hear. Though you preach like an angel you will not say anything more important than that letter of St. Paul to the Corinthians, or that Psalm of David which a pastor may read to the backs of the heads of the congregation. Laymen and ministers, speak out! The opening exercises were not instituted to clear your voice but to save souls. If need be, squeeze a lemon and eat troches for the sake of your voice, before you go to church; but once there, make your first sentence resonant and mighty for God. An hour and a-half is a short time anyhow to get five hundred or five thousand people ready for heaven. It is thought classic and elegant to have a delicate utterance, and that loud tones are vulgar. But we never heard of people being converted by anything they could not hear. It is said that on the Mount of Olives Christ opened his mouth and taught them, by which we conclude that he spake out distinctly.

God has given most Christians plenty of lungs, but they are too lazy to use them. There are in the churches old people hard of hearing who, if the exercises be not clear and emphatic, get no advantage save that of looking at the blessed minister. People say in apology for their inaudible tones: "It is not the thunder that kills, but the lightning." True enough; but I think that God thinks well of the thunder or he would not use so much of it. First of all, make the people hear the prayer and the chapter. If you want to hold up at all, let it be on the sermon and notices. Let the pulpit and all the pews feel that there are no "preliminaries."

Sabbath School Workers.

THE present generation is very nearly being given up to money-making and indulgence. Our chief hope of the redemption of the world is in the coming generation. They are as splendid a collection of boys and girls as ever skipped and romped, trundled hoop and played ball. But they will go right along in the footsteps of their predecessors unless a strong tide shall set in from the Sabbath Schools. The churches do not reach the young to a very great degree. We ministers have to be learned and profound and mysterious in order to keep our reputation, and get the anticipated Doctorate. Consequently the children sleep in church, or kick the foot-stool, or snicker right out in uncontrollable mischief.

To the Sabbath Schools we look for the redemption of the children. Light them up with song and anecdote and good cheer. Let not the male teachers spend the hour of Sabbath School in stroking their whiskers, nor the female teachers in arranging their back hair, nor the librarian in casting languishing glances at the young ladies who take half an hour to find a book that they do not want, nor the superintendents in violent ringing of the bell and scolding for order, themselves most needing to be called to order. When teachers or superintendents lose patience till they are red in the face and are snappish about the Lord's work, they had better go home. Let us have our Sunday Schools aflame with love and zeal. Our recent Sabbath School competition showed how earnest, how faithful and devoted these children are, their attendance records eclipsing anything that could have been anticipated. Let us garner these young souls for God before Satan comes along. Get the chickens under warm sheltering wing, for there are hawks in the sky.

Ought we to Wear Mourning?

THIS is a question that from the earliest days of Christianity has, at times, agitated the Church. It was specially dominant in the first centuries, when every divergence from Jewish or Pagan rites was almost an act of faith. Now the Jews, after the death of their relatives, wore sackcloth during their time of mourning, which lasted from seven to forty days. They sat on the ground, and ate their food off the earth; they neither dressed themselves, nor made their beds, nor went into the bath, nor saluted any one. This excess of grief rarely lasted long; then a great feast was made for the surviving friends of the dead; or the bread and meat were placed upon his grave for the benefit of the poor. (Tobit 4: 17; Eccles 3: 18 and Baruch 6: 27.)

It was natural for the Christian, with the hope set before him, to oppose this despairing sorrow, and we find St. Jerome praising those who partially abandoned it; while Cyprian declares he was "ordered by Divine revelation to preach that Christians should not lament their brethren, delivered from the world, nor wear any mourning habits for them, seeing that they were gone to put on white raiment, nor give occasion for unbelievers, by lamenting those as lost whom we affirm to be with God."

As the Church lapsed from its simplicity into forms and ceremonies, vestments of all kinds, and for every purpose and occasion, gained importance; and the first serious protestation against mourning garments came from the Quakers. To these spiritual men and women it seemed absurd to wear black garments for those whom they believed had put on everlasting white. The majority of the early Methodists held the same opinion, though in a less positive form. It is remarkable, however, that Christians alone assume the woeful, despairing black garments which seem to denote not only the loss of life, but the end of hope. Ancient Egypt wore yellow in memory of departed friends; the Greeks and Romans used white garments for mourning; the Chinese also consecrate white to the services of death, and the Mohammedans wear blue because it is the color of the visible heavens.

Therefore I ask, if we must wear a distinct dress to typify our sorrow, why black? Black has now become objectionable, from having lost all the sacred meaning it once possessed. It is no longer the livery of grief. The blonde belle wears it, because it sets off her fine complexion; the brunette, because it admits of the vivid contrasts, so suitable to her brilliant beauty. The prudent wear it, because it is economical and lady-like; and all women know that it imparts grace and dignity, and drapes beautifully; so for these and many other reasons, it has within the last fifty years become an every-day dress, one just as likely to express vanity as grief.

The reasons set forth by the Quakers for its abandonment cover the ground, and are at least worthy of our consideration. They are: First, that mourning had its origin in a state of barbarism, and prior to the revelation of "Life eternal through Jesus Christ" and is therefore not to be observed in civilized and Christianized countries. Second, that the trappings of grief are childish, where the grief is real, and mockery where it is not. Third, that mourning garments are absolutely useless, for if they are intended to remind us of our affliction, true grief needs no such reminder; if to point out our grief to others, they are an impertinence, for true sorrow courts seclusion; and if as a consolation, they are only powerful to remind of an irrevocable past. Fourth, their inconvenience. Too often the house of death is turned by them into a busy workshop; and the souls bowed down with grief, made to trouble themselves about mourning ornaments and becoming weeds. Fifth, their bad moral influence; the gracefulness of the costume stills the grief that ought to be stilled by religion; and as in a large family there must be many mourners in form only, the equivocation of dress, is a sort of moral equivocation. Sixth, their expense. This is really a great item in the resources of the poor, and often straitens for years; besides causing them in the hour of their desolation, to be so worried and anxious about the robing of the body, as to miss all the lessons God intended for the soul.

The advocates for mourning plead the veiling of the heavens in black at the death of Christ; and the universality, and continuance of the custom, in all ages, all countries and all faiths. I am aware that the subject is one in which strangers cannot intermeddle; the question when it arises must be settled by every heart individually. But at least, if mourning garments are to be worn, let us not defeat every argument in their favor, by fashioning them of the richest stuffs, and in the most stylish manner. This is to tickle them as the thinnest of mockeries. And after all if we approve mourning, and wish our friends to hold us in remembrance after death, can we not find a better way than by crape and bombazine? Yes, crape and bombazine wear out, and must finally be cast off; but the "memorial of virtue" is immortal. When it is present, men take example of it, and when it is gone, they desire it: it weareth a crown, and triumpheth forever.

BRIEF NOTES.

Two French Protestant missionaries, Escande and Minault, have been brutally murdered in Madagascar.

The $236,000 necessary to secure Mr. Teller's gift of $350,000 for the liquidation of the Baptist Missionary Societies, almost made up as we go to press, and it will probably be pledged before the date of Mr. Rockefeller.

The two hundred and twenty-eighth anniversary of the Presbyterian Church of New York, N. Y., was celebrated on June 25, 1878, service was held in 1609. The first church was a very rude structure, was built in 1603, present edifice has been in use since 1803.

Bishop Tucker, of Central Africa, who just returned from his diocese for the first time of some business, says: "I have been a year for twenty years. In Africa a teetotaler is fitted to cope with the climate than even a moderate drinker."

The camp meeting at Sing Sing, N. Y., commenced Thursday, August 5th, and continues. The Rev. Thomas Harrison and the C. Morehouse are to have charge of the Bishops Andrews and Newman and other moderate preachers are to be present.

Hon. John G. Brady, the new Governor of Alaska, was formerly a Presbyterian minister. He subsequently severed connection with the Board of Christian Missions. Dr. Sheldon Jackson and other missionaries speak very highly of the result of Brady's mission work.

At a recent meeting in London at speaker delivered an eloquent address on "Worship and Suffering." Ireland, described the terms of the poverty of the people, speaker rose and remarked incidentally that a brewery in Ireland had divided among its holders as the profits of the year no less than a half million dollars.

An outlaw who was hanged in Pike County, Mo., much of his time since he was hanged in making a striking cartoon of his ruin. It represents a number of sitting playing cards at a table on which liquors of various kinds are in bottles and under the sketch are the words: "This is my message to all my friends. Beware!"

The first instalment of the million which the Baroness de Hirsch has promised to the Jewish fund, for the benefit of the poor of New York, has been received. It is one-fourth of the whole gift. It is expected that it will be some way to promote the removal of the city to the country, either by aiding rent and stock farms or in some other way.

Dr. William H. Whitsitt, President of the Baptist Theological Seminary, whose article on baptism has stirred up his brethren requested by the Kentucky Baptist Association to resign his office. In the course of it Dr. Whitsitt stated that English Baptists springing prior to the year 1641, it is known whether the trustees of the Seminary yield to the vote of the Association.

An effort is being made to raise $15,000 for the purchase of a large tent, or movable building, in which to continue in New York the religious meetings commenced by Mr. D. L. Moody and continued by Dr. A. C. Dixon and others and evangelists. It is estimated that ten thousand dollars will be needed. Dr. A. C. Dixon, South Oxford street, Brooklyn, will be glad to receive contributions.

The Ritualists are making progress in their efforts to Romanize the Episcopal Church. The High Church, in its annual report, shows that the daily Eucharist is celebrated in 500 churches, that increase is 337, and that ritualistic vestments are worn in 1,337. It says that a large advance in the Episcopal confessional is reported; but regret is expressed that prayers for the dead and extreme unction are not making the headway that could be wished.

A Paris dispatch from Georgeot says that the General Association of Baptists there, adopted a resolution declaring one engaged in the liquor business or saloon-keeping should not be retained in fellowship, and that the churches retain members should be denied representation in the association. As there are a great many stillers and wholesale dealers in the Baptist Church in Kentucky this resolution is in the nature of a bombshell.

Rev. R. G. Pearson's meetings at Va., were remarkable for the number of conversions and for the benefits to church-members. A journal says of the results: "Many were adjusted and many hearts made lighter for this reason. There was a general upswing in all religious work. Every pastor, who was in town, worked shoulder to shoulder with the evangelist; and those who sent urged their members to be earnest in assistance."

"The most subtle and deceitful horror ever existed, and one which wrecks the life of many a young girl's life," was the subject of a sermon by Rev. J. L. Moody, in the June 18th, London Journal. "It is the common delusion that a man best reform a man by marrying him. It is a mystery to me how people can be so blind. Hundreds of cases in every community where homes have fallen and innocent lives been wrecked, because some young girl, seduced in marrying a scoundrel in the hope of him, I have never known such a union, a seen hundreds of them, result in anything but ruin and disaster."

The ladies who were elected last year to the office of Mayor of New York, Kan., to fill all the offices of the city, have had to use violence to get their pledges. They promised that if elected they would rid the town of saloons, gambling-houses. After a legal fight of months, they had to confess themselves that line. One notorious saloon was closed. The women armed with hatchets, and demolished the building. The furniture were chopped to pieces and liquors emptied into the gutter. A notice was posted on the ruins of the threatening similar vengeance on any who run another saloon in the town.

MENELIK'S RECEPTION.

HOW far Menelik, King of Abyssinia, is able to appreciate the tributes paid to him by the European powers, is not known, but if he does understand the meaning of the visits he is receiving, he must feel flattered by the attention. A short time ago distinguished envoys from Russia waited upon him; and in the person of Prince Henri of Orléans, has gone to his court to tender friendship; and now England has sent an embassy, escorted by imposing personages, to her tributaries in India. Menelik considers himself a person of importance. It is not long since European envoys were speaking contemptuously of him as a bare-footed negro; but now he is treated with respect as "the Negus," "the King of the Kings of Ethiopia," and "the Emperor." So much has come from his victory over the army of Italy at Adwa, and the dignity with which he conducted the subsequent negotiations with that government. Menelik has given ample proof to all whom he meets, that he is in no way deficient in that peculiar kind of "dignity" which European powers are so ready to give to other potentates on the African Continent. Menelik appears to be able to protect himself not only against his enemies, but against what African kings would regard as necessary, as well as against his friends. He receives the diplomats who come to him with courtesy, and is not overawed by the condescension of the powers in thus courting him. The English mission, received by him at his residence at Addis Abbaba. Its members were taken into a large hall, the ceiling of which was of thatch, supported by wooden chairs were brought for their accommodation, the king having learned that Europeans use those articles. For himself, he prefers the simple attitude, but as he sits on a kind of high dais approached by steps, and overhung by a gorgeous silk canopy, there is no humility about his stature. He was dressed in a black silk burnous, embroidered with gold thread, and his head was covered with a white turban in the manner of Hindoos, but the covering was far less voluminous and elaborate than those they wear. Around him stood warriors and high functionaries; his court were picturesquely arrayed, all showing him the utmost respect. The embassy had brought a letter from the Queen, which was handed to him by the chief of the mission, Mr. Rennell Rodd, with a courtly speech, translated by an interpreter accompanying the embassy. Menelik replied in his native language, which was translated into French by his own interpreter. After the formality, the king talked freely with his visitors about their journey, and asked many questions indicating intelligent interest in European affairs. He is reported to have expressed a wish to negotiate a treaty with England, which he said should be ratified by Prince, Germany and other governments having interests in his neighborhood. It was not pleasant, Menelik said, to have hard parties carving up his empire without consulting him. He impressed his visitors with a shrewd, good-humored, capable man, not likely to be easily outwitted. So long as the European powers maneuver to get possession of the largest part of Africa, that Menelik has need of his wisdom to keep his country out of their clutches. He has good reason to distrust their proffered friendship, and to be cautious about accepting their advice. It is a pity that it should be so, for it may cause him to distrust the counsels of the envoys of the King of kings, which are disinterested, and, if he accepted them, would tend to the highest welfare of himself and his people.

Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord. (Ps. 33:12.)

To Reach the Pole.

Lieut. Peary has secured from the Government five years' leave of absence for Arctic exploration. In talking with a New York reporter last week, he gave a rough sketch of his plans. He proposes to start next week on a preliminary excursion to give notice to the Esquimaux to lay in an extensive store of walrus-meat for the dogs, and skins, and furs, and other necessities. He will return in September and then begin collecting the provisions to last five years, organizing his party and getting together the scientific instruments that will be needed. By March of next year he hopes to be at the head of navigation with his vessel and to land his supplies. A village will be established at the point of landing as a base and thence the march northward will begin. A whole year will be occupied in transporting provisions and supplies on this march, forming depots at various stages, so that when the time comes for the final march to the pole there will be no need to carry provisions for the return journey as the explorers will rely on finding at the depots the supplies that will be deposited in advance. The Lieutenant expects that at the end of the year he will have his last depot within 360 miles of the pole fully provisioned. This will be March, 1899, if his present plans are carried out. From that point he intends to carry forward supplies by short stages on a single sledge, returning to camp and removing it piecemeal until a point is reached from which a dash can be made for the pole. He feels confident of success and his hope is based on the fact that he will not be hampered on his final march, by having to take with him the supplies for a long journey. He will rely on the provision that he will deposit beforehand. The Christian in his journey through life may take a hint from the explorer's plan. His needs have been foreseen by his Heavenly Father, and at every stage of his journey he will find ready for his use not the supplies that he has laid up, but the grace which God will give for his daily need:

Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. (Matt. 6:34.)

Sued Her Father.

A remarkable suit was tried last week in the Second District Civil Court in Brooklyn, N. Y. It was brought by a married lady of that city against her father, to recover a bicycle. It appeared from the evidence that her marriage was opposed by her father. Finding that his parental authority did not prevent her keeping up the acquaintance with her lover, he tried the effect of bribes. He offered a gold watch and chain and one of the best bicycles in the market if she would finally discard the young man. She agreed and gave her promise to see him no more. But as the novelty of the gifts wore off, she regretted giving the promise and, after a few months renewed the engagement, and finally married him clandestinely. She left the bicycle behind when she went away to be married and her father kept it. He would not be reconciled to his daughter and when she sent for the bicycle he refused to let her have it. Thereupon, she entered suit to recover it. She was obliged to admit under cross-examination that the gift had been conditional and that she had not fulfilled the conditions. In view of that fact her suit was dismissed. She probably stealing Arabs. Baron Dhanis appears to have left a contingent of these picked men with others in each of the stations he established during the past year. Many of them still remained with the advancing main column, and for some reason not yet made known, they grew discontented. On February 15, while the force was at Dirfi, they rose in mutiny and killed Captain Leroy and every white man in camp. They then set off southward toward their homes, picking up on their way their fellow countrymen at the various stations. At every station there was a fight, in which the white commandant and his men were killed. News of this series of massacres was slow in reaching headquarters and when, at last, Baron Dhanis heard of what had taken place, the mutineers were fifteen hundred strong. Collecting all the faithful troops at hand, he immediately hurried forward with all speed toward Stanley Falls to intercept the revolting column. It now appears that he and his troops have also fallen victims, and the mutineers flushed with victory are calling other tribes to their help and threatening the Congo State. As it will be several weeks before reinforcements can reach the field, there are grave apprehensions of the mischief that may be done in the interval. The danger arises from the fact that the mutineers are drilled and armed with European weapons. It is a pity that the Belgians took that method of civilizing the natives. If they had adopted the methods of the missionaries and had taught them to love instead of to fight, this danger might have been averted. They are learning by sad experience the truth of our Lord's warning:

They that take the sword shall perish with the sword. (Matt. 20:32.)

A Cripple's Race with Fire.

A local journal publishes a matter-of-fact story of an act of heroism performed on a mountain on the Virginia line. The Richmond, Va., reporter says that a boy named Tim Ofin, who lives high up on the mountain, is well known among the scattered inhabitants through a misfortune which some years ago deprived him of both legs. His courage and cheerfulness in his crippled condition have made him a favorite everywhere he goes. He hobbles about on his artificial limbs, always ready to do a service or to do any kind of work that he can get. About three weeks ago his work took him to the top of the mountain and he stopped on the summit looking down on the other side. As he gazed, a fire commenced in the woods far below him. It burned rapidly and spread with fearful velocity. The boy knew that directly in its path there was a large frame house in which the only inhabitants were two old women and their blind brother. There was little probability of the old people knowing anything of the danger which menaced them. Without considering what pain and weariness the journey would involve to his mutilated limbs, the boy set off down the mountain side in the hope that he would reach the house before the fire cut off the escape of its inmates. Nerved by the danger and stimulated by the sight of the approaching fire which seemed to get fiercer every moment, he hurried on. It was a race with the flames and he a cripple. Twice he fell, but he was up again in a moment and hurrying on. The flames had reached the edge of the farm when he entered the door, almost fainting with fatigue. He aroused the old women and helped them harness their horse. In a few minutes the blind old man was brought out and the poor frightened creatures were flying before the pursuing fire. They reached a place of safety where the old women told how they had heard of their peril and leaving all their property had saved their lives by the flight. The poor boy's effort had not been in vain. If every Christian was as much in earnest in warning people who were in danger of eternal destruction, how many might be saved!

If thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way, that wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thy hand. (Ezek. 33:5) thought her father would not defend the suit and that she would get the bicycle as well as have her own way about the marriage. There are many people who act in the same way about religion. After renouncing the world and accepting Christ, they long for the pleasures they have given up, and try to make the best of both worlds—an attempt doomed to failure.

No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one and love the other; or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. (Matt. 6:24.)

The Belgian Disaster.

Ominous news of a massacre in the Congo Free State is published by the Belgian journals. They report that an expedition under Baron Dhanis which left Matadi in July of last year for the hills, has been utterly destroyed and that Baron Dhanis and all his officers have been killed. The expedition comprised, beside the white men, about two thousand armed natives. They were to establish stations along the boundary of the State, which runs from north to south, to build forts and garrison them, hoping by that means to prevent the incursions of the Mahdists into the Congo State. Among the native forces engaged in the expedition were a number of men of the Batetela, or Balussu, nation, who were esteemed as brave fighters and had done good service in engagements with slave-

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Paul at Thessalonica and Berea

Sunday School Lesson for July 18. Acts 17: 1-12. Golden Text: Acts 17: 11.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

HE god and prince of this world did not allow the invasion of his kingdom by God's "chosen vessel" Paul without raising all the opposition possible. As with his Master before him, so with this Apostle, the chief opponents to the Gospel were the religious people of the day, the leaders of the Jewish synagogues. In Philippi, as we have seen, this was not the case; the enemy came more openly to the front in the case of the possessed girl, now that he saw the Word which he so hated, and which had vanquished him in the wilderness, penetrating into a new quarter of the world. He was permitted, however, to succeed in driving Paul and his companions out of Philippi, but the church which was founded there remained, and the living stones which had there been quarried were lost to the enemy forever.

Passing through Amphipolis and Apollonia, the missionaries arrived at Thessalonica, where was a synagogue of the Jews, and Paul, as his custom was, went in unto them and for three Sabbath days reasoned with them

opening and alleging that it behooved the Christ to suffer and to rise again from the dead: and that this Jesus, whom, said he, I preach unto you, is the Christ. (Acts 17: 1-3, R.V.) The matter of Paul's discourses, as well as his authority, was the Word of God in the Old Testament. Jews were supposed to know the Scriptures. "Ye search the Scriptures and in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they that testify of me" said our Lord. (John 5: 39, R.V.) Paul opened them, and on the ground of Scripture illuminated by Scripture, as the Holy Spirit lit it up, he alleged that the Christ, whom they all expected to be a reigning Christ, must suffer and rise again from the dead. Having clearly proved this, he pointed to him as the Christ who had suffered and risen again.

The evidence to honest, unprejudiced minds was incontrovertible, and there ran from heart to heart of those that were "persuaded," in that European synagogue, the glad consciousness, "We have found the Christ." "Him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write" (John 1: 41, 45) "Some of these were Jews, 'a great multitude' were Greeks, 'of chief women not a few.'" The Gospel came to these "not in word only, but also in power and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance" (1 Thess. 1: 5). The very description implies that there is such a thing as the Gospel coming "in word only." There were, even in Paul's day, some unsatisfactory conversions. Perhaps they were the exception then; are they not in these days of a backsliding church rather than the exception? Why should missionaries work have born such fruit then? The messengers were men full of the Holy Ghost and empty of themselves. Their hearts were virgin soil. This point is not to be feared, as many in our socialistic Christendom have learned, to hear the Gospel without accepting it, to know the Christ without walking in it, and the Thessalonians had seen no such thing. Christlike Christians. Paul could testify of these converts: "Ye became imitators of us and of the Lord. And this from the outset of their putting faith. This was

NORMAL CHRISTIANITY.

They began not only to make use of Christ for their soul's salvation, but to imitate him. No less a model would serve for these healthy babes in Christ. They saw Paul, Silas and Timothy walking in the way they taught, they saw that following Christ was not simply a doctrine, but a life and a power. They saw it could be done, and they gave themselves up to the Holy Spirit to work in them conformity to Christ. The purpose of their life was no more to do the best for themselves. They had "turned to God from idols (their own self-life included) to serve the living and the true God and to wait for his Son from heaven." (1 Thess. 1: 9, 10). Many of the modern hymns which are full of the peace and joy which they make the end and aim of believing in Christ, would have shocked these early believers; self seeking was foreign to them, they lived not unto themselves but unto him which died for them and rose again.

The power of God manifested in Paul's ministry these three Sabbath days in Thessalonica moved the envy of the Jews. Their Bible readings and exposition produced no such effect. Wherefore? Just because they brought their own wisdom to bear on the truth of the living God instead of yielding themselves up to it. It became a thing outside of themselves, instead of being "spirit and life" (John 6: 63) within them. When men yield themselves up to the spirit of jealousy, it becomes a possession, they are no longer their own masters, Satan deceives them: the god of this world blinds the minds of them that believe not (2 Cor. 4: 4), and they see take up their cross and to follow Christ, (Matt. 16: 24), they did not in any way pity themselves or think a strange thing had happened unto them. (1 Pet. 4: 12), when they were persecuted. They received the Word in much affliction with joy of the Holy Ghost, so that they became an example to all that believed in Macedonia and Achaia, and paved the way for the preaching of the Gospel in all the country round. Meanwhile, Paul and Silas, no way disconcerted by the persecutions at Thessalonica, did in Berea as they had done there. But in this city they found a ready mind in the Jews themselves.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

HEROIC Christianity has had its examples in every age, and not the least in these early days of persecution. The great Apostle, accompanied by Silas and perhaps by Timothy, went forward when driven out of Philippi. Bruised and beaten and imprisoned, we might have expected him to turn back in discouragement, but he was not the kind of man to give up a mission because it was dangerous. Keeping his face westward and travelling about thirty miles a day, he went on to the beautiful city of Thessalonica, which, now known as Salonica, is built on the side of a hill overlooking the Archipelago. There was a Jewish place of worship there and so Paul halted. There would be an audience there which would understand his message. We infer from his remarks in his epistle to this church (1 Thess. 2: 9), which is probably the oldest book in our New Testament, that his funds were exhausted. He evidently found work at his not show their envy in their accusation. They became very loyal on a sudden, pretended that Paul had been persecuted. That is a very common thing. To this day the opponents of the Gospel do not show their true motive. They usually concerned about liberty, or the workingman having his Sunday rest and pleasure, or some such plea is likely to attract public sympathy. They gave security, that is, became bail missionaries, apparently undertaking that they should quit the city. This they did in the night, to avoid attack from the Jews. They went on, still westward, to a distant about fifty miles and a town, where they would be protected. There they went into the synagogue, usual, though one would have expected that their experience would have led them to avoid these places of worship. They said the people were more noble, less prejudiced, than those of Thessalonica. They listened and tested the statements of the Apostle. Paul evidently liked that course. He was much afraid of honest investigation. Some modern teachers are, who in people accepting their doctrines or. They made many converts here, their enemies from Thessalonica, of their success, followed them and Paul had to be hurriedly sent away. It was humiliating to follow his history. Think how often good men such as have like him, been driven away from people whose welfare they sought. As great writer has said: "No matter how quiet a city was, when they entered it, was sure to be in an uproar when they left." There was valid reason for the accusation that they turned the world side down; but, then, it needed to be Searched the Scripture daily, and those things were so. Dr. Tyndal's story of the singular conversion of a Jew. He was called to visit a dyer in Philadelphia and found her singularly calm and even joyous in her faith. Her husband was an infidel. Just before she took a little well-worn Bible under her pillow and put it in her husband's hands. She asked him, "I know what I am doing?" He said, "You are giving me your Bible." She said, "not my Bible, your Bible." "Soon afterward she breathed her last. A few days later the widow's band called on Dr. Tyndal. 'I want to read the Bible,' she said, 'I have been reading my Bible. I never read it before. It is a wonderful book. It seems to be expressly for me. It must be, otherwise it could not have told me so much about myself. I want to be a Christian.'

Another King, one Jesus. On the day of that must have been a large charge looking very much like soldiers, but if Paul's teaching were properly understood Caesar himself would not have objected to it. A king could have no other subjects than men who owe allegiance to Christ. A young man came to Paul from England to establish a factory. The employer unhesitatingly placed in his hands a large sum of money. "I am not running a great risk?" one of his friends asked. "When that young man gets on the other side the Atlantic there to hinder his starting in business his own account with your capital? I have taken any security for his being to you?" The employer said: "Bless me, I never asked him to be loyal to me. I doubt if he would have promised if I had asked. I have better security than that. He is a sincere Christian and will be loyal to his Lord. That is enough for me. Following Christ, as I am sure he will, he will never defraud me."

These that have turned the world side down. What a tribute that is to the power of a few uneducated, spicuous men. It is a well-known fact that in nature the most powerful are those which work quietly. Professor Tyndall, describing the chemical action of the waves of ether mentioned the remarkable fact, that the waves which up to this time been most effective in shaking asunder the atoms of compounds are those of least mechanical power. "Billows," he instructively said, "are incompetent to produce effects are readily produced by ripples." In the sphere of morals. The influence of a woman or a child has often surpassed that of a man, where eloquence and learning have failed. God has chosen the things to confound the mighty.

THESSALONICA, NOW KNOWN AS SALONICA, IN ROUMELIA.

all things through the color of their own self interest and self-worship. The Jews felt injured that while they had not spiritual power, this man Paul who came among them should have power to transform lives. If such lives were the true samples of godliness, then their own lives and teaching were a failure. This they would not admit. When men yield themselves up to an extraneous influence, they lose control of themselves. Where was the dignity of these representatives of Abraham when to accomplish their purpose of silencing and bringing trouble upon Paul, they "took unto themselves certain vile fellows of the rabble, and gathering a crowd, set the city on an uproar? God permitted that they should go so far as to assault the house of Jason, where they expected to find the missionaries; instead of which Jason and some of the new-born Christians were already privileged to bear the brunt of persecution and to suffer for the name of Christ.

The charge against the foreign teachers was characteristic. "Men which have turned the world upside down are come hither also." Would to God the Christians of to-day were turning the world upside down! Alas, alas, it is the world in this day which turns the church upside down. The old plea of danger to the Roman government, urged in the accusation of Christ, was brought forward again here. Security was taken of Jason and the rest and then they let them go.

But the brethren had managed to send away Paul and Silas by night unto Berea. This early test of their faith was a great strength to the infant church at Thessalonica, only three weeks old. Understanding their calling to deny themselves to trade as a weaver and the people of Philippi twice sent him a present. (See Philippians 4: 16.) On the Sabbath he went to the Synagogue and proclaimed his message. It was his usual argument, when addressing Jews. The prophecies, properly understood, indicated that Messiah would be a sufferer, and that Christ had fulfilled them. "Opening and alleging," Luke says. Bengel paraphrases the phrase as "cracking the nut and producing the kernel." He appears to have won some converts among the Jews, principally women, and a much larger number among the non-Jewish people. His epistle refers to the number who had turned from idols (1 Thess. 1: 9), from which we conclude that his work was most successful with the Gentiles. This was to be expected, as by this time the pagan world had become disgusted with the absurd and incredible mythology which was the prevailing religion. But the Jews who did not believe, grew envious and stirred up a riot, calling in the aid of the loafers in the market-place, with whom usually they would not associate. The opponents of the Gospel often find themselves in degrading company. Paul appears to have been staying with Jason, who was a relative of his, and the mob attacked the house. Failing to find Paul, the mob took Jason and made a complaint against him for harboring the Apostle.

Incidentally, it is worthy of notice, that complaint was made to the politarchs (translated, rulers). It is an uncommon word, but recently an ancient arch was found at Salonica, bearing an inscription which refers to the rulers as politarchs. This shows how accurate and circumstantial Luke was. The complainants did

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE.

Cuba's Hapless Children.

Thousands of them Orphaned by the War
Many Coming here—Christian Work among the Spanish-speaking People.

ONE of the saddest results of the long war in Cuba is the unfortunate condition of thousands of children whose parents have perished in the protracted struggle. At a point where the conflicting armies met, the greatest sufferers have been the pacíficos or non-combatants—the large peaceful and industrious agricultural whose homes have been desolated, fields ravaged and their belongings destroyed. While many who formerly pacíficos have been forced into the Cuban ranks and fallen in the hands of others have met a cruel fate at the hands of the Spanish soldiery, the policy of Gen. Weyler's grim policy of exterminating the rebels. In many cases the women have not been spared and the little children, orphaned and helpless, are now a spectacle of the pity of the civilized world.

Letters from Cuba and reports brought by the Captains of the steamers, state that the condition of the poorer class of Cuban is a sad one. The wasted towns and villages are a scene of desolation, and that women and children in great numbers are in a state of destitution. Sickness in all forms is also ravaging the country, and the lack of food, clothing and medicine is adding to the general misery.

Thus far the Spanish authorities seem to have taken no measures to relieve the distress. Our own people, however, have taken pity on the afflicted ones and no little aid has already been sent to them from the United States. Besides this, aid has been afforded to many in the country, and a refuge has been opened to all who have thus succeeded in coming to American shores. In Florida, and especially at Tampa, in that State, many of the Cuban have been received and kindly cared for. Rev. Mr. de Cova, a missionary at Tampa, has interested himself in the Christian people in the refuge, and is now conducting an excellent and profitable work among them.

Christian ladies, Mrs. C. M. Selden and her sister Miss Strong, who have had many years' experience as missionaries among the Spanish-speaking peoples in Mexico, are now conducting a most efficient religious and educational work in Tampa, mainly among these Cuban refugees. In 1886 they began work alone in Tampa, by house-to-house visitation among the Spanish-speaking people. Later the work grew, a committee of Christian ladies organized "The Medical Aid Society for Spanish work in New York and Brooklyn" with Mrs. Selden as superintendent and Miss Strong as secretary, and with headquarters at 126 West Street, Brooklyn. Gospel meetings were held for the "strangers in a strange land" and a Sabbath School was opened for the children. Later, this work has been largely Cuban, many refugees from the "ever-faithful isle" being sent to Tampa by persons who knew of its needs. During the past year, a number of Cuban orphan children have been brought to the Society for support and relief, and the work of the Society has been greatly broadened in consequence.

Classes for the orphan children have been opened. At the present time there is a large training class of girls whose ages range from five to sixteen. A number have been baptized and made confession of their faith in Christ since entering the class. With three exceptions all in the class are Cubans. Nearly all have eventful histories. One girl was taken by her mother to Gen. Weyler in Cuba to plead for the liberty of her uncle who was in prison. Her pleading was in vain. She is a child of unusual promise. She and six others in the group were destitute refugees from Cuba. Two girls are the daughters of a Dr. Gaston who was active in a former revolution in Cuba. Another is a daughter of a Cuban for whose head a price was offered by the Spanish government. The group of boys shown in our photograph, with one exception, are children whose fathers at one time could have provided liberally for their education, but the war made them penniless. One is a boy who, with his five orphaned brothers and sisters, was without a friend in the world. He is a boy of great promise and intelligence, yet at times a sadness painful to see in one so young oppresses him, as he remembers the awful scenes in his own country—the beating of women and children by the soldiers and his own parents' terrible fate. A score of other boys, now in the Society's care, have similar stories.

Every week brings new applications to five miles in a straight line from his door without reaching the boundaries of his estate. Mammoth driveways and cycle roads run everywhere, and there are miles of them, carefully graded and kept smooth. There are no little children in the Biltmore home, for its owner is a bachelor; no motherly or sisterly society to give it brightness and sunshine. Yet it is a lovely place, and in its grand and commanding situation might have been, in some earlier age, the castle of some stern, feudal lord. It is a centre of attraction for all who happen to visit Asheville or its vicinity.

Mourning Etiquette in Japan.

In the Mikado's country, the ceremonials incident to court etiquette are so numerous and exacting as to be monotonous. It is learned that a recent unconscious infraction of the laws of Japanese etiquette, committed by several European governments, had caused the Mikado much sorrow and no little chagrin. Some time ago his esteemed mother, the Dowager-Empress, died, and the fact was duly communicated to all the courts; yet the only courts which took the trouble to express condolence with the Mikado were those of Spain and Belgium, which ordered court mourning for ten days. Neither Emperor William, Queen Victoria, Emperor Franz Josef, King Umberto, nor even the Czar sent any expression of sympathy to the Mikado for the loss of his imperial mother. The Japanese court,

"THE OLD BOOK ON THE STAND."

I LOVE it, the beautiful, dear old Book
As it lies on the stand in my study's nook.
With its promises sweet and its visions grand,
The beautiful, dear "Old Book on the Stand."
'Tis my mother's Bible—this Book so dear—
On its leaves are traces of many a tear.
'Tis worn with use, and 'tis yellow with age,
But every page is a sacred page.

For her own dear hands turned them to and fro,
In the far off years of the long ago.
Precious indeed is that Book divine,
And precious memories round it twine.
And though its covers are broken and worn,
And its pages soiled and defaced and torn,
It has done its work for a hundred years,
It has lifted our sorrows and calmed our fears.

And the Chart by which mother sailed out to
Is certainly good enough for me! [sea.
Sailed out to sea, with the sails all set,
And the light on her face—I can see it yet!
Radiant and sweet—as she sailed away—
To the harbor safe of eternal day!
Do you wonder I touch with reverent hand
The beautiful, dear "Old Book on the Stand?"

SPOILING CHILDREN.

IT isn't a difficult task to spoil a child. No great art is demanded to accomplishing this result. Make all the nurses wait on him and fly at his bidding, writes Dr. Talmage. Let him learn never to go for a drink, but always have it brought to him. At ten years of age have Bridget tie his shoe-strings. Let him strike auntie because she will not get him a sugar-plum. He will soon learn that the house is his realm, and he is to rule it. He will come up into manhood one of those precious spirits that demand obedience and service, and with the theory that the world is his oyster which with his knife he will proceed to open. But if the child be insensible to all such efforts to spoil him, try the plan of never saying anything encouraging to him. If he do wrong, thrash him soundly; but if he do well, keep on reading the newspaper, pretending not to see him. There are excellent people, who, through fear of producing childish vanity, are unresponsive to the very best endeavor. When a child earns parental applause he ought to have it. If he get up head at school, give him a book or an apple. If he saw a bully on the play-ground trampling on a sickly boy, and your son took the bully by the throat so tightly that he became a little variegated in color, praise your boy, and let him know that you love to have him the champion of the weak. Perhaps you would not do right a day, if you had no more prospect of reward than that which you have given him. If on commencement-day he make the best speech, or read the best essay, tell him of it. Truth is always harmless, and the more you use of it the better. If your daughter at the conservatory take the palm, give her a new piece of music, a ring, a kiss, or a blessing. Never withhold due meed of praise.

The Desire for Amusement.

There is in every good thing a right use and an abuse, says a writer in The Religious Telescope, and in amusement it is the abuse that is to be condemned because it is harmful. The thirst for amusements which causes the husband to spend his evenings at the club, while his wife is left to watch over his children in loneliness at home, is a crime against the home and an insult to womanhood. A few years before, this man forsook all other society and devotedly spent his evenings in the company of and wooing her who in her unsophisticated innocence supposed that he was sincere and really did and always would prefer her company to all others. Now he leaves her alone through the long, lonely evenings, while he finds amusement with "gay fellows, well met." Is such a one a manly man? Are his amusements innocent? In selecting his society and amusements the man who is truly a Christian will be careful not to go where he cannot ask God to go with him. Where amusements are wisely chosen by young Christians (and there are plenty of such amusements and associations), they can as cheerfully pass into glory amid the merry ring of laughter, as from the solemnity of a prayer-meeting, or the calm and quiet of a sick chamber.

YOUNG CUBAN EXILES, MADE ORPHANS BY THE WAR.

the Society for the admission of other Cuban orphans, robbed by the war of their natural protectors, but the work is already overtaxing its resources. With sufficient aid from those interested in the welfare of these unfortunate Cuban children, it would be practicable to extend the work so as to receive many more orphans to be educated and trained for Christian service. Any reader who desires to learn further of this deserving organization can do so by addressing Mrs. Selden, the Superintendent.

A Palace in Sky-Land.

Such is, in truth, the new residence of Mr. Vanderbilt, at Biltmore, near Asheville, N. C. It is situated in the mountains, and one might almost add, among the clouds. Its millionaire owner allows the public to visit his grounds and admire the palace, though it is not everyone who gets a glimpse within the chateau where he has stored many treasures of art and history. No king, nor queen, nor prince, nor lord, on this earth has a more magnificent palace than this young man has built for himself high up among the mountains. He has spent more than $4,000,000 on it, and intends to expend $2,000,000 more, and if he lives to enjoy it, it may cost him all of $10,000,000 before many years. He has 180,000 acres, and can travel thirtysince 1881, has carefully gone into mourning for two German Emperors, for two Czars, for a King of Spain, of Portugal, and of Holland, for a Dowager Empress of Germany, an ex-King of Spain, and even for Prince Henry of Battenburg. Naturally the Mikado thinks that Japanese courtesy has been ill-required.

A Wise Princess.

Among the many anecdotes of Queen Victoria, recalled during the Jubilee, there is perhaps no one more beautiful or instructive than this, which is related of her childhood. From early youth, she seems to have been possessed of the noble, sensible, conscientious characteristics of her mother. It is said that while quite young she discovered, by examining a genealogical table, that she was heir to the throne of England, and that when she realized the fact she said to her teacher, "There is much splendor, but there is more responsibility;" and then she added, in a solemn tone, "I will be good." It is said that during her public career she has never been known to shrink from a duty. Once when urged by her ministers to sign a document because it was expedient, she replied in her quiet, firm way: "I have been taught to judge between what is right and wrong, but 'expediency' is a word I wish neither to hear or understand."

A Shelter Amid Strangers.

The "American Girls' Club in Paris" and its Surroundings—Spiritual and Material Comforts for those who Need them—A Worthy Institution.

It is but a few years ago since an American clergyman, Rev. W. W. Newell, called the attention of Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, wife of the then American Minister to Paris to a number of particularly pitiful cases of want and distress among the American female students residing in the French capital, and these two warm-hearted Christians thereupon combined their efforts to provide against future emergencies of the kind. The result of the labors of the one and of the generosity of the other took the form of what is now known as the "American Girls' Club" in the Rue de Chevreuse, a veritable god-send in many ways to our young countrywomen whom the love of art or the ambition to secure an independent competence has impelled to settle in the great Ville Lumière, the City of Light, as the Parisians fondly love to term their native place.

How many an American girl reaching Paris with the scantiest means has decided to "do in France as the French do," or rather to do in the Latin Quarter as the Bohemians do! Instead of taking quarters among her own people or even in an inexpensive French boarding-house where at least her meals would be served hot three times a day, she has preferred to settle down in the chambre garnie or furnished room in some rookery, devoid of all comfort and home-like appearance, and for her food she has started to frequent the neighboring restaurants. Naturally enough she speaks no French and so everybody takes advantage of her, and soon she finds expenses ahead of her allow-philanthropic but not a charitable one in the ordinary sense of the word. The whole object of its founders would be set at naught if the accommodation it affords were gratuitous and the very class they desired to reach would hold itself aloof from its portals. For let me say at once that the bevy of bright young women whom I encountered on the day of my visit to the institution last week, as a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, were not of a kind to accept charity from anyone. Without belonging to the exaggerated type of American girl student described above, they are independent enough to pay their way under all circumstances.

The headquarters of the Girls' Club has a forbidding aspect from the outside. Like most houses in old Paris it is grimy with age, smoke and dust, but within its doors, the whole scene changes. We find ourselves in a quadrangle, on three sides of which arise the stately, though irregular buildings of the institution, on the fortable reading-room is stocked with the best American, English, and French publications, and on a large board between the two windows are daily attached numerous announcements and advertisements of washerwomen, etc., etc. There is, moreover, a "red room" and a "blue room" for whiling away spare hours, and a fine large reception room for receiving visitors. The little chapel, a few yards away, was constructed in 1891, as an outcome of the joint action of the Rev. Mr. Newell and the Rev. Dr. Morgan, rector of the handsome American cathedral in the Avenue de l'Alma, and it has so far proved a great success in attracting the American girls, and even the male students of the Quarter. The present rector, the Rev. Dr. J. Van Winkle is a newcomer, but an apparently earnest worker and certainly a man of sympathetic personality, who has already endeared himself to many of his flock.

It would be unjust to conclude this article without mentioning Mesdames Monroe, Lamson, and Luckmeyer, three prominent members of the American colony in Paris, who compose the Board of Trustees, for it is to their indefatigable endeavors and liberality that the present prosperity of the institution is in large part due.

ance. As her means decrease, she has to devise new methods for making extremes meet, and as her rent cannot be cut down further, the pruning process has to be performed on her expenditure for food. She now has to be satisfied with a trip to the charcutier or delicatessen dealer from whom she obtains a few cents' worth of sausage or potted meat; and occasionally she buys a cake at the baker's. These meals so partakes of in her own dreary attic, where the wind and the rain of times penetrate the crevices of the walls, adding to the general desolation and discomfort. But what matters all this to her, for the maison she is independent. While her head holds out under these distressing circumstances, the poor girl manages to stifle the situation. It is only when lack of proper nourishment and exposure to elements, added to overwork at the atelier, bring her down and stretch her on her back that she ceases her forlorn and helpless condition, surrounded by strangers in a foreign land, and unable to make her wants and sufferings known. It was just such cases as these that touched the heart and opened the purse of the American wife, causing her to lay the foundation of the institution of the Rue de Chevreuse which at the present day has within its walls many female students from the other side of the Atlantic.

The institution, I should explain is a fourth, an old-fashioned gateway with an iron-bar railing. Everything is bright and cheerful here, the pretty bed of flowers in the centre of the yard and the creepers and exotic plants around the gateway and on the balcony imparting a veritable charm. Outside is another garden with a swing in the centre, and a few steps further stands the little American house of worship built of corrugated iron and known as St. Luke's Chapel.

It was the time for afternoon tea when I arrived at the institution and the amiable superintendent, Madame Cressoniere, an Anglo-French woman of distinguished mien ushered me into the tea room on the ground floor. Here, around a steaming samovar, they sat, our girl workers from the great Western republic, the nervous and alert Southerner, the self-confident and progressive maiden from the West, the practical, positive, somewhat hard-headed New Englander. It was a refreshing sight in this strange land; for the moment one could fancy one's self back in America. The tea with the dainty slices of graham bread and fresh butter is served gratis daily at five. This feature the institution also owes to the generosity of Mrs. Whitelaw Reid. The other meals are charged for at very low rates.

The housing of the inmates is excellent, and the rental far lower than in any lodging house. The spacious and com-

Learn about the new Thermo-Ozone Method

FOR ALL MEDICINES. FOR ALL DISEASES.

This illustration shows treatment of Catarrh with the Thermo-Ozone Battery (non-electric). It cures not only this ailment, but any acute disease at its beginning sending both oxygen and medicine into parts diseased.

When medicine is taken internally the effect is never sure, because the medicine is changed in the stomach. Oxygen, ozone, or medicine, is not when sent into the blood circulation by the force generated by the Thermo-Ozone Battery. In 5,000 test cases the following percentages were obtained: Nervous Prostration, 88%; Chronic Rheumatism, 95%; Bright's Disease, 95%; Typhoid Fever, 100%.

EX-LIBIT GOV. JONES, of Binghamton, N. Y., perhaps best known as the great scale man who "pays the freight," was nearly blind for eight years. On May 15, 1897, the Thermo-Ozone was applied to his eyes. At that time he could see only five inches. On June 13, after a course of applications, he reported that he could see eighty inches. For the first time in years, Ex-Libit Jones walks on alone.

In the River of Silver.

Triumph of Beautiful and Prosperous Argentina and Buenos Ayres, its Capital City.

FROM Rev. W. P. McLaughlin, D.D., one of our leading missionaries in South America, now stationed at Buenos Ayres, Argentina, we have received the following very interesting letter describing "The Golden City of the River Plate," and the beginnings of Gos-

work there: "Were in our prosaic days can city so rich in country so mythical exist? On the banks of the River Plate, so close to a swift steam launch takes three hours to pass from shore to shore. Here is a magnificent city which now is approaching 800,000 and in less than a century will have 1,000,000 souls. Argentina is the 'Silver Land,' and Rio de Janeiro is the 'River of Silver,' and Buenos Ayres is the 'City of healthy breezes,' with its docks, its public palaces and private mansions, its colossal banks and its enormous commerce is indeed a Golden City. A hundred years before the Pilgrims, its foundations were laid. In the wilderness, as by magic almost, a magnificent city has risen. Now you see its avenues, brilliant with the electric light, as spacious and splendid as those radiating from the 'Arc de Triomphe' in Paris. It is a cosmopolitan city, a city of tongues. You hear the dialect of Tuscany, the polished French of Paris (for it is claimed that in Buenos Ayres they do not speak French), the guttural of the Rhine, the tongue of Shakespeare spake, almost all other languages of earth, and on every side of the city the rhythmic dialect of Spain. Steamers arriving and departing keep the city in close touch with the thought and movement of the world. The great daily papers are admirable for their full cable service and in their editorial tone. The public school buildings of the city are many of them palaces with marble floors and finest architectural details. Speaking of splendid buildings, the city is somewhat of a digression, the city is a masterpiece of architecture. Its grandeur should be mentioned. Its magnificence can be judged when you know that on the adornment of the city alone $500,000 in gold was spent. The National University is strongly established while a flourishing system of Normal schools exists in the city and the suburbs. There is a great National Library open daily to all for consultation, and the majority of the books are French, with any hospital in the world. 'Prince George's Hall' is the finest in the city, with its marble stair-cases, its frescoed walls, its soft electric lights—a veritable fairy palace. There are two large musical societies among the English people. They render every year the great Oratorios and other classic music. Lately, all were astir with preparations for the 'Diamond Jubilee.' The 'American Church' will have a celebration which will equal any of the rest. The English press must not be forgotten, there are three dailies, and a score of weekly and monthly publications.

"In the city and suburbs there are twenty English speaking churches, all self-supporting. The First Methodist Episcopal Church is commonly called the 'American Church.' It was founded sixty years ago, the first pastor being Dr. John Dempster, renowned in his denomination later for being the pioneer in founding its schools of Theology. The pastor preceding the present incumbent, Rev. Thomas H. Stockton, died here five years ago after a pastorate of nine years. He was the son of Dr. Thomas H. Stockton, the noted pulpit orator, once chaplain of the United States Senate. The 'American Church' is a handsome structure in the centre of the city. It cost with the ground $125,000 gold. Nearly all the material in it (all of the wood) came out from the United States. It was built mainly by its own members and is en-

Many a bedridden person, also some, who walked on crutches regained their health through this marvelous cure and in order that every similarly afflicted reader or their friends may learn about it, I will gladly mail them a Trial Package with directions for use and information Free, even if more than 15,000 should apply. Distressing cases of rheumatism from 20 to 40 years standing yielded to the benign influence of this remedy of which I mention a few: In Pittsburg, Ind., it cured a druggist whose rheumatism dated back as far as the civil war. In Kenterville, Idaho, it cured a man who was bedridden for 15 years. In Fountain City, Wis., it cured a man who suffered for 33 years notwithstanding employing 7 physicians. In Seguin, Texas, it cured a man who was afflicted for 41 years. In Amsterdam, N. Y., it cured a lady (Mrs. P. Persohn) who nearly became insane from pain. Mrs. John D. Engel, 1316 Patterson Ave., Baltimore, Md., was cured after suffering for 9 years, of which she spent 2 years on crutches. Mrs. M. THE KING'S HIGHWAY

CHAPTER XV—Continued.
Coming Back.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

"JOHN," continued Steve, "this very afternoon I got a new idea, and whatever comes or goes, it is to be carried out. No man is better fitted to carry it out than you are, and I am much amazed you have not long ago suggested it to me.

"What is, then, this new idea that I ought to have suggested long ago?"

"I want us to own and publish a newspaper—a good paper that will represent God and the people. I want a paper that can go where the preacher cannot go. Have you considered what a power a few sheets of well-filled paper may become? Why, John, there is no earthly, moral power equal to it."

"The preacher—"

"I do not underrate him; but you have to go to the preacher and the paper comes to you. If the weather is stormy and the church is far away, the congregation consider that they must dress for church, and get their best clothes spoiled and a cold perhaps into the bargain. The paper preaches to them at their fireside and in their six-days' coat. The paper permits them to talk back to it. They say to one another as they read it—'Listen to this, mother,' or 'What do you say to that, father?' They discuss its theology and ethics freely among themselves, and everyone feels interested in a sermon they have a share in. Again, the preacher gives us the truth through one man's heart and mind; the paper speaks to us through a great many hearts and minds. The preacher is very much restricted as to subjects; if he goes too far afield, he is afraid to offend; the paper speaks out boldly, and 'stop my paper' won't stop it from speaking the truth. John, we must have a paper. Call it The King's Highway and let it tell us all that is being done on that great thoroughfare—good and bad."

"Have you thought of the expense?"

"To be sure I have. You know something about publishing a paper. You know what backing it will need. The Lloyd estate is good for it."

"Amen! Now what is to be the spirit of this great paper?"

"It is above all things to be tolerant, and to be the organ of the poor and the needy. It is to speak for the oppressed and the suffering in all lands. If there is a wrong or a sorrow at our antipodes, it is to point out the wrong and comfort and relieve the sorrow, and that without regard to race, creed or color."

"Amen! What else?"

"Give the people a good sermon and a good, clean love-story. Men and women never tire of either."

"A love story?"

"Yes. Old and young read love stories, nor will they ever tire of them until they tire of April's ever-returning mystery of daffodils and crocus buds. Women especially will read love stories; give them pure sweet tales of home and home affections, and say a word or two specially for the women, something that has grown out of woman's joy and sorrow and manifold trials and experiences. John, I am astonished we have not thought of this wonderful paper before!"

"So am I. Now about the price, Steve?"

"Make it so good that every one must have it, but so cheap that every one can pay for it."

"You will lose money—lots of it in that way."

"The same thing was said when cheap postage was proposed, but cheap postage has not yet ruined the Government. But suppose I lost money in this way, it would not be lost. No, sir! It would be money out at the best interest ever humanity pays."

"Is it to advocate any special creed?"

"God forbid. Unless it could show to all mankind how every cause and creed might be combined by love:

Yet not long
The fountain whence they rose,
As if with many a rivulet
The lordly flood on flows.

Steve was by this time in a fever of enthusiastic foreseeing. He would hear of no such word as "failure," and when John reminded him of the large sums already disbursed and the large sums necessary for carrying on all his plans, Steve was in no way disconcerted.

"I have to give for two," he said, "for I am sure, if my father could come and speak to me now, he would say, 'pay all that I owe to the poor, Steve. Pay it with both hands.' I have five millions left, and you tell me it is increasing. I cannot use it myself. My wife and children cannot use it. Do you want me to bury it in a napkin, and add dollar to dollar, until its very weight will sink me to the lowest hell?"

"God forbid, Steve."

"Then help me to do good with it, John."

"Have you fully told me all your mind; is there no lingering wish or even fear?"

"I was wondering to-day, if we had given prominence enough to the Locomotion Fund. I am sure, John, that speedy locomotion for the unemployed is as necessary as hospitals for the sick."

"I think you are right. I will have more said about it."

"Get the paper to talk as quick as you can."

"I will. Anything else? You know we may not have another opportunity for this discussion in many months."

"We may never have another opportunity. I have been much struck with the power of music and song over those poor fellows in the Bowery Mission. Into all our charities, John, get as much music as you can—psalms and hymns and holy songs. I think, myself, that even in heaven, King David must remember 'The Lord is my Shepherd,' and be happier for having sung it."

He rose as he spoke, and John rose, and the two men went to the window and looked out over the tossing ocean. There were tears in both their eyes, and Steve passed his arm round John's neck, and John looked into his friend's bright, eager face, and then broke quite down.

"Oh, Steve! Steve!" he cried; "do not go away! do not go! I cannot bear to lose you! Oh, my friend! my dear, dear brother!"

And Steve embraced him, and with great emotion said softly, "I am so glad to hear you speak thus, John. I knew you felt it, but oh, it is good to hear it said. I wish men were more often able to throw aside all restraint, and say the kind and noble things they feel." And then both remembered at the same moment, the same words, and smiling, said them softly together—

O God! That men would draw a little nearer
To one another! They'd be nearer thee;
And understood.

We are glad to inform the readers that a sure specific cure for Asthma and Hay-fever is found in the Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery from the Congo River, West Africa. Many sufferers report most marvelous cures from its use. Among others, Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, Editor of the Farmer's Magazine, and Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, West Va., were completely cured by the Kola Plant after thirty years' suffering. Mr. Lewis could not lie down at night in Hay-fever season for fear of choking, and Mr. Combs was a life-long sufferer from Asthma. Hon. L. C. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, writes that for eighteen years he slept propped up in a chair, being much worse in Hay-fever season, and the Kola Plant cured him at once. It is truly a most wonderful remedy. If you are a sufferer would advise you to send your address to the Kola Importing Co., 1161 Broadway, New York, who to prove its power will send a Large Case by mail free to every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who needs it. All they ask in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

their life and order it to his absence. That sense of the irrevocable which always depresses those whom the ocean sunders, paralyzed the day of parting. No one could do anything, yet all made it a point of honor to affect a feeling of pleasure in Steve's holiday. Even Jessie bravely fought back tears, and showed Steve a parting face radiant with smiles. But in spite of this assumed satisfaction—perhaps because of it—the reaction was a definite depression. It was the middle of the week, but John could not buckle to work, and the whole family went back with Jessie, and gave the day up to conversation and speculations about Steve.

The first two weeks were the hardest. After they were over, letters began to come with an unexpected regularity, and the lassitude of regret grew rapidly into an enthusiasm of expectation. Every one wished to do something great and unusual before Steve's return. Jessie resolved to build some additions to the house, and to make her flower-garden a wonder and a delight. When Steve came back it should be to a home that would make him forget all other homes—a home such as she had heard him long for, with rooms large, sunny and airy, and without too much furniture in them, and a garden full of solitary walks, redolent with fruits and flowers and musical with bees and birds. She recalled all his desires, and was determined to bring them to pass.

John had the paper on his mind. There

CHANGE OF CLIMATE as a means of relief from this distressing malady is, at best, uncertain, annoying, and expensive. It never cures, and the relief is but temporary. Year by year the benefit is less, and new places have to be tried. Business interests suffer because of enforced absence; your family may have to suffer because deprived of necessities in order to pay your bills; you suffer yourself if you return "ahead of time."

NOT SO with our patients. They can stay at home in comfort, carry on their usual occupation, and perform their duties; have relief from the terrible itching, burning, sneezing, coughing, wheezing, and distress for breath; can sleep sound, and awake refreshed; and best of all, can be CURED TO STAY CURED.

"Having suffered acutely from Hay-Fever for twenty years, and finding relief only in Europe or the mountains, it needed only ten days' trial of your treatment to find perfect relief. I took the medicines six weeks last season and their effect upon my system was constantly beneficial in every way. I sleep, eat and work better than ever, my complexion is clearer than for years, and during the past winter, although the weather has been very trying, I have been absolutely free from any colds or coughs."

RALPH EMEISON, 131 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.

"I did not send you a report of my condition because I felt so well that I discontinued the use of the medicines. I scarcely know how to thank you for the good results your medicines produced in making the dreaded Hay-Fever and Asthma bearable to me. Every year during the Fev season, I have had to leave the city at great expense and inconvenience to myself and then suffered from the Asthma on my return. I tried every remedy suggested by friends, had operations performed upon my throat and nose, but to no purpose. Since I started to take your medicines, August 7th, I have been absolutely free from Asthma and I remained quietly at home, happy and grateful. If you desire, you may publish this in order that your medicines may do for other sufferers what they have done for me."

Respectfully yours,

THE KING'S HIGHWAY.

enty of journalist talent in New York and money enough to buy it, and the weeks, The King's Highway as reflecting on paper, the work done, and be done, in order to drive Apollyon to great thoroughfare, and prepare it for the coming of the Lord of Hosts. He was sitting at breakfast one morning in the Salutation Inn, at Ambleside, the first number came to him. He was proud of it, that he could not eat with mouthful, and instead of loitering in the lovely land a week or two, as he intended he was moved to go at once to Edinburgh, and see what he could find worthy of its pages. After all, his own forecast was in vain only too true. Go where he would he was dashed by the spirit of economy observable in all European cities. It seemed to him that they had a and that their service was chilled and cramped by this necessity. In all his life John, he magnified the charities of his own country. Putting them against the older lands, he felt compelled to think that they had nothing to learn in them, and a great deal to teach, in a rendering of theories.

"And," he wrote, "that charitable ear hard to enter, and when the ear is surmounted, I have only a deep pity and disappointment. In respects, I think the criminals of our age are better cared for than the and I have come to the conclusion, that at the charities of any land should be ingenious, should spring from its conditions and necessities. I think I could go through Europe and many ideas worth appropriating; for we could not go through the best New York with our eyes and ears, and not find more good roads of charity than we could possibly obtain of experience led him very far in this estimate. He spent some time in Norway, Sweden, Germany and after leaving England; but was impressed with the bitterness of the struggle they had to struggle with, and the scarcity of their resources for such a struggle. Asia saddened him still more, was sufficient for such widespread misery he asked despairingly. Finally, he decided to return to his own vineyard, and to the centre of his labors and to begin his "beginning first at Jerusalem" at New York—and yet not forgetting those whom it was possible to help in New York.

Dealing with his charitable investigations had been many sweet retirements to solitude he loved. The lonely and mountains of Scotland, the canyons of Norway, the deserts of the isolated stations of India, and the cherry gardens of Japan, had all with some sweet, secret place of reflection. These experiences, his soul grew to perfect stature of the sons of God, and as solitude was to him, he still felt, the low, sad music of humanity as he rose from the plane of what I do to be "saved," to the far more of "Lord, what wilt thou have of me?" What is it that thou requirest of me?

One day while sitting in a very room of beauty and sweetness near the city, suddenly felt that he must arise to a sensuous dream, and go forth there to, and for what purpose, he knew not, only that his days of rest were over. Then he started for San Francisco immediately, and as soon as he the stress of civilization round him, to his spirit. A telegram to Jessie his first thought, and he found the bill of telegrams and railways to be sent. This telegram brought a life to Steve's home; the glad news of his speedy return rang through the grounds, and stirred every one to bound and delight. How eagerly then he watched for the letter sure to follow the telegram. It came as quickly as possible word in it glowing with love and expectation.

When he took the first train home, my wife Steve wrote, "but there are many of our people in this vicinity, I see. They helped me in my illness and nursed me when I was sick and helpless. I may never get so far from home, and at any rate, dear wife, I shall come here and not remember them. And alas! I have already heard, that one good woman needs my remembrance sorely. Since she watched me through a severe fever, her husband has died, and she is now making a hard struggle to find bread for her children. But oh, Jessie, my darling, after the joy of gratitude, the joy of seeing you! The joy of the children! The joy of home and work and friends! I am so happy, I cannot say how happy I am!"

And Jessie was not much disappointed at the delay. "It is just like Steve," she said, between laughing and crying, "and Steve is right, is he not, John?"

"I am sure he is, Jessie," answered John. "Steve may never be in San Francisco again, and it would wound these old friends, if he did not call on them. And if they need his help, the sooner help is given, the more welcome and gracious. At the very longest, Steve should be home in nine or ten days."

Everything in life now worked to that happy expectation. In nine or ten days Steve would be home. The spring was in all its glory, the shrubs just budding, the tulips and daffodils getting ready to blow open, and in nine or ten days the fruit trees would be like great white bridal bouquets of blossoms. Jessie was satisfied with the garden, and she went through her house, room by room, adding a touch of color, hanging a picture in a better light, filling the vases with fresh flowers (for in her heart she expected Steve much earlier than John said) and watching the children, lest they should do anything which might mar the spotless beauty of their appearance.

Neither did she neglect herself. She desired, as every good wife does desire, to be fair in her husband's eyes, and there were still some traces of that terrible ordeal by fire that she had undergone. Her fine coloring had never returned, and perhaps never would, and she was yet a little lame, and perhaps always would be so, but apart from these drawbacks she was a handsome woman. True religion makes women handsome, for nothing is surer than that a lovely soul illuminates and makes beautiful the body it dwells in. Jessie also knew the value of becoming costumes, and her fresh spring toilets of green and white, with little suggestions of amber or pink, carried out that symphony of color in which Nature had clothed the whole world around her.

In Jessie's heart there was a faint disappointment, when on the evening of the eighth day Steve did not appear. But she was far from acknowledging it. Steve's last letter to her had said he might leave on the following day, and so he could have reached home. But he did not, and there was no letter or telegram to explain the delay. Two more days passed to the same disappointment and silence. Jessie was now angry, and a little fearful, the more so, as John came out to ask her, if she had received any word from Steve. He affected a cheerful confidence in "all being right," but Jessie had a sickening dread that something was wrong.

The dread grew and spread. Mrs. Lloyd and Alice came to inquire of Jessie the next day, and John, now really anxious, followed them. He cautiously admitted that Steve might be sick, and he thought some telegraphing ought to be done, if it was only to satisfy themselves that there was nothing seriously wrong, and as all urged this method of relief, John immediately put it in practice. The hotel from which Steve had written was first interrogated, and the answer was perplexing. "Mr. Lloyd was here for four days. His trunks are still here and await orders." A great terror spread swiftly from heart to heart. Telegrams flew to and from every station on the route home, but no information was obtained. Then John went West to make such search as love and gold could make.

In the meantime, Jessie was nearly frantic with a thousand fears. She tried to pray and could not. She had made John promise if he found Steve sick, to telegraph for her, and she walked restlessly about the room, with her bonnet and cloak lying on the table, ready to start for her husband's side at a moment's notice. But John could not find a trace of Steve. At the hotel he was well remembered, but from the moment he passed out of its doors, no sign of him could be discovered. Fear deepened into despair, and the awful silence of uncertainty and suspense, nearly broke their hearts.

A PIONEER SHOEMAKER.

WORKING AT HIS TRADE ALTHOUGH EIGHTY-FIVE YEARS OLD.

Mr. James McMillen, of Champaign, Has Followed the Shoemaker's Trade All His Life—Every Day at His Bench Working with Apparently the Same Vigor as a Young Man—A Sketch of His Life.

From the Gazette, Champaign, Ill.

At the advanced age of eighty-five years, James McMillen, of 112 West Washington street, is one of the most active men in Champaign, Illinois. Mr. McMillen is a pioneer citizen of the city, and his form is as familiar on the streets as that of any citizen of the town. All his life Mr. McMillen has followed the trade of shoemaker, and every day finds him at his bench, bending over his work with apparently the same vigor he commended when he was a young man.

He has a little shop on North Wright street, in the vicinity of the University of Illinois, and he is the official shoemaker, as it were, for the students of that institution.

About a year ago Mr. McMillen was absent from his bench for several weeks, and his familiar form was missed along the streets. The local newspapers announced that he was dangerously ill. For months he was a sufferer, but finally he appeared again at his shop, and has lost but very few days since then and none, perhaps, on account of sickness. His friends were surprised to see him out again, and they were more surprised when he told them the cause of his recovery.

There was no small amount of local interest in his case, and a reporter visited him, to have him relate the story.

"I feel," said the spry old gentleman, "that I owe my life to Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. Something like a year ago it appeared to me that I was almost a physical wreck. I was suffering from a disease of the kidneys. A thick scurf had formed on the bottoms of my feet and my ankles were terribly swollen and inflamed. In fact, they reached such a condition that I could not walk, and it looked as though my days were numbered."

"I read in the newspaper testimonials from people who claimed to have been cured of kidney trouble by the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and thought that it would do me no harm to give them a trial. I bought a box of them at the drug store and began taking them according to directions. It may seem strange, but it is a fact that I felt the benefit of them almost as soon as I began to take them. After I had taken a few pills my urinal discharges became almost as black as tar and I noticed at the same time that the pain and soreness were leaving my kidneys."

"A few days later the swelling began to go out of my ankles, and at the end of five weeks it had entirely disappeared, taking with it that terrible scurf which had formed on the bottoms of my feet and caused me so much trouble. I continued to gather my lost strength, and at the end of six weeks I felt entirely recovered and resumed my work at the shop. I think I took from four to five boxes of the pills and have taken none since."

Mr. McMillen's residence on West Washington street, is more than a mile distant from his shop, but nearly every day he walks the entire distance, morning and evening, and he could not do this if that swelling still existed.

Mr. McMillen has no backwardness in talking of the merits of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People contain all the elements necessary to give new life and richness to the blood and restore shattered nerves. They are sold in boxes (never in loose form, by the dozen or hundred) at 50 cents a box, or six boxes for $2.50, and may be had of all druggists or directly by mail from Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y.

agricultural contrivances, and although the improved modern plough is vastly more efficient than the old, the same principle that was characteristic of the plough of earlier times in the East, is found in the very latest product of our great agricultural implement manufactories, whose output reaches almost every part of the civilized world.

Egypt, the mother of science and invention, claims the honor of being the first nation to use the plough, and it was undoubtedly one of the first countries to be reclaimed after the Flood. What implements were employed by the ancients, from the time of Cain, who was "a tiller of the ground" (Gen. 4:4), and succeeding generations, up to the time when the Ark rested upon Ararat, and being a cross-bar of wood about five feet in length, and padded at either end where it rested upon the withers of the animals. Ploughs almost identical in construction are seen to day in many parts of India, in Arabia, Persia, Asia Minor (among both Turks and Armenians), and even in China. In Palestine, the plough in common use differs very little from that of Egypt, and both bear evidence of a common origin.

Our photograph shows an Egyptian husbandman at work in the fields. It is the season of ploughing, and the laborer hitches up his ox-team to the quaint wooden plough, almost under the shadow of the pyramids—the oldest of earthly monuments. Along the Nile are many villages like that shown in the illustration—low-lying, flat-roofed huts, largely of mud. An old historian has written: "The river of Nile is the happy genius of the Egyptian soil," and the great fertility of the country along its banks and in the lowlands enclosed by its branches, has brought together a scattered population of agriculturists who dwell in these mud-villages in apparent and it is now impossible to determine, although it is not unreasonable to conjecture that, even in those days, a rude form of the plough may have been in use. The ancient Egyptian plough was made wholly of wood, and was of the simplest form. It consisted of a "share," two handles, and a pole or beam, which was inserted into the "stilt," or base of the handles, and was strengthened by a rope con-contentment, cultivating crops of maize and other grains, besides onions and garlic. Effective missionary work has been done among the dwellers along the Nile by the United Presbyterian Church of America, and also by the Charismatic Missionary Society, the former having stations as far up the Nile Valley as Assuan. Through these efforts, many of the natives have been brought into the Gospel fold.

of earnest men, gathered in that place and there, under the leadership of the Michaelius, organizing the pioneer church, which was destined, in after years, to exert so great an influence on the religious life of the nation. In 1633, Rev. Everardus had succeeded in gathering a substantial congregation and a plain church building was erected on the banks of the East River, on the site now occupied by No. 33 Pearl street. In 1642 the little colony had so increased that a new church was built of stone with "a roof of split oaken shingles, a tower and a steeple." This edifice known as St. Nicholas Church, accommodated the people for over half a century and was often used meeting-point and a refuge in many an alarm of an attack. Situated within Fort Amsterdam, this stone church forms a prominent feature in the old prints of New York in the early days of Dutch occupation. The historian proceeds:

The early settlers brought with them the Bible, the psalm and two persons called Xrank bezekers or vroeters (consolers of the sick), viz: Sebastian Groenland and Jan Huyck, who, in the absence of a minister, gathered the people together and read to them passages of the Scripture, suitably arranged for consolation and comfort. But in 1628, the Rev. Jonas Michaelius arrived, and in the summer of that year organized a church which has had continual existence to this day, and is with reason supposed to be the first Protestant church on this continent. In 1664, the colony was surrendered to the British, and New Amsterdam was renamed New York; but this fact did not affect the rights of the church, which under the new government, retained its former privileges. The conquerors required that the people should have worship in their own tongue, and accordingly, the chaplain of the English forces officiated; but he had no proper place in which to celebrate divine service, an arrangement was made by which he could officiate in the "Church in the Fort." After the Dutch had ended their own morning worship, the Church of England minister was read to the Governor and the garrison. This custom continued for more than thirty years. In 1672, churches were organized in 1642, at Fort Oranien (now Albany), and in 1654 one at Flatbush, and another at Brooklyn, L. I. Others were afterwards established along the Hudson River and in the Mohawk Valley, as well as in New Jersey and Pennsylvania; and by 1771, the number had reached seventy. The growth of the denomination was retarded by its dependence upon Holland for ministers, and by the retention of the mother country's public service when English was generally and more freely spoken. Up to 1772, the churches had been under the control of the ecclesiastical authorities in Holland, but in that year the connection severed and the American Church was made independent and self-governed. While the Church accepted the standards, polity and usages derived from Holland, she has always made additions to her ministry or membership from other evangelical bodies. Not a few of her members have become strongly attached to her character and order, and by their loyalty have increased her strength and influence. Her chief characteristics have been and are, her uncompromising adherence to doctrinal truth, insistence upon an educated ministry, unyielding attachment to her own views of faith and order, and a large charity for all others who hold to Christ, the Head.

Since those early days, the progress of the Dutch Reformed Church in America has been steady and uninterrupted. It is one of the most influential of all the Protestant denominations. At the present time it maintains the following institutions:

Theological Seminaries: 1. At New Brunswick, N. J.; 2. at Holland, Michigan; 3. at Arcot, India. Colleges: Rutgers College (formerly Queen's), at New Brunswick, New Jersey; 2. Hope College, at Holland, Michigan; 3. North-western Classical Academy, at Orange City, Iowa; 4. Pleasant Prairie College, at German Valley, Illinois.

In the year 1655, the First Reformed Protestant Dutch Church of Brooklyn was regularly organized simultaneously with one at Midwout or Flatbush. Governor Petrus Stuyvesant designated Dominie Polhemus as minister, and the people pledged him a salary of 1040 guilders ($416.66), a year. The preacher undertook to conduct alternate services at "Midwout, Amerstoort, and Breuckelen," but the people of the latter place demurred, complaining that they had only a fifteen-minute service once every two weeks. A separate church was accordingly organized at Breuckelen, in 1660, with Dominie Henricus Selyns as pastor. The first church there was erected in 1666, in the middle of what is now Fulton street, and the Dutch West India Company presented it with a bell.

During the period from 1666 to 1802, much progress was made and a long line of faithful pastors filled the colonial pulpits. A Second Dutch Reformed Church was built in 1766, and, in 1792, Dominie Schoonmaker delivered the first sermon ever preached there in the English language. The third edifice was erected in 1807 and the fourth in 1833. In 1863, the words "Dutch Protestant" were dropped from the denominational title.

At the present time the largest, most spiritually active and vigorous Reformed Church in Kings County is that on Seventh avenue and Carroll street, Brooklyn, of which Rev. James M. Farrar, D.D., is now pastor. Dr. Farrar was pastor of the Fourth United Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, where for six years he conducted a most successful pastorate, before being called to Brooklyn.

He began work in his new field in September, 1890. In eight years the entire character of the membership has changed and almost every Protestant denomination is now represented on "common ground." Broad evangelical methods of Gospel teaching have been introduced and the result has been a wider measure of usefulness than ever before.

Rev. Dr. Farrar is a native of Pennsylvania, where he was born in 1853. He studied at Westminster College in that state and also at Princeton Theological Seminary and was ordained in 1878. His church is a very beehive of Christian activities and its large Sunday School, its societies, circles, fraternities and other auxiliaries, inspired by his example, are full of zeal and energy for the Lord's work.

FIRST REFORMED CHURCH, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Our photographs of the beautiful building which is now occupied as a Temple of worship by Dr. Farrar's congregation are interesting as showing the architectural progress of the Dutch Reformed Church, since the early days of the denomination. It is one of the grandest religious edifices in the City of Churches, its main auditorium, chapel, organ, memorial windows and general decorations being finished in a style that harmonizes well with the sacred purpose for which the building was designed.

THE SECRET OUT.

Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: I. Sam. 15: 14.

And Samuel said, What meaneth then this bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen which I hear?

THE Amalekites thought they had conquered God, and that he would not carry into execution his threats against them. They had murdered the Israelites in battle and out of battle, and left no outrage untried. For four hundred years this had been going on, and they say, "God either dare not punish us, or he has forgotten to do so." Let us see. Samuel, God's prophet, tells Saul to go down and slay all the Amalekites, not leaving one of them alive; also to destroy all the beasts in their possession—ox, sheep, camel, and ass. Hark! I hear the tread of two hundred and ten thousand men, with monstrous Saul at their head, ablaze with armor, his shield dangling at his side, holding in his hand a spear, at the waving of which the great host marched or halted. I see smoke curling against the sky. Now there is a thick cloud of it, and now I see the whole city rising in a chariot of smoke behind steeds of fire. It is Saul that set the city ablaze. The Amalekites and Israelites meet; the trumpets of battle blow peal on peal, and there is a death-hush. Then there is a signal waved; swords cut and back; javelins ring on shields; arms fall from trunks, and heads roll into the dust. Two hundred and ten thousand men wave their plumes and clap their shields, for the Lord God hath given them the victory.

Yet that victorious army of Israel is conquered by sheep and oxen. God, through the prophet Samuel, told Saul to slay all the Amalekites, and to slay all the beasts in their possession; but Saul, thinking that he knows more than God, saves Agag, the Amalekite king, and five drove of sheep and a herd of oxen that he cannot bear to kill. Samuel comes and asks Saul the news from the battle. Saul puts on a solemn face, for there is no one who can look more solemn than your genuine hypocrite, and he says, "I have fulfilled the command of the Lord." Samuel listens, and he hears the drove of sheep a little way off. Saul had no idea that the prophet's ear would be so acute. Samuel says to Saul, "If you have done as God told you, and slain all the Amalekites and all the beasts in their possession, what meaneth the bleating of the sheep in mine ears, and the lowing of the oxen that I hear?" Ah, one would have thought that blushes would have consumed the cheek of Saul! No, no! He says the army—not himself, of course, but the army—had saved the sheep and oxen for sacrifice; and then they thought it would be too bad anyhow to kill Agag, the Amalekite king. Samuel takes the sword and he slashes Agag to pieces; and then he takes the skirt of his coat, in true Oriental style, and reads it in twain, as much as to say, "You, Saul, just like that, shall be torn away from your empire, and torn away from your throne." In other words, let all the nations of the earth hear the story that Saul, by disobeying God, won a flock of sheep but lost a kingdom.

I learn from this subject that God will expose hypocrisy. Here Saul pretends he has fulfilled the divine commission by slaying all the beasts belonging to the Amalekites, and yet at the very moment he is telling the story, and practicing the deception, the secret comes out, and the sheep bleat and the oxen bellow.

A hypocrite is one who pretends to be what he is not, or to do what he does not. Saul was only a type of a class. The modern hypocrite looks awfully solemn, when he prays, and during his public devotion shows a great deal of the light of his eyes. He never laughs, or, if he does laugh, he seems sorry for it afterward, as though he had committed some great indiscretion. The first time he gets a chance, he prays twenty minutes in public, and when he exhorts, he seems to imply that all the race are sinners, with one exception, his modesty forbidding the stating who that one is. There are a great many churches that have two or three ecclesiastical Uriah Heeps.

When the fox begins to pray, look out for your chickens. The more genuine religion a man has, the more comfortable he will be; but you may know a religious impostor by the fact that he prides himself on being uncomfortable. A man of that kind is of immense damage to the Church of Christ. A ship may outride a hundred storms, and yet a handful of worms in the planks may sink it to the bottom. The Church of God is not so much in danger of the cyclones of trouble and persecution that come upon it as of the vermin of hypocrisy that infest it. Wolves are of no danger to the fold of God unless they look like sheep. Arnold was of more damage to the army than Cornwallis and his hosts. Oh, we cannot deceive God with a church certificate! He sees behind the curtain as well as before the curtain; he sees everything inside out. A man may, through policy, hide his real character; but God will after awhile tear open the whitened sepulchre and expose the putrefaction. Sunday faces cannot save him; long prayers cannot save him; psalm-singing and church-going cannot save him. God will expose him just as thoroughly as though he branded upon his forehead the word "Hypocrite." He may think he has been successful in the deception, but at the most unfortunate moment the sheep will bleat and the oxen will bellow.

One of the cruel bishops of olden time was going to excommunicate one of the martyrs, and he began in the usual form—"In the name of God, amen." "Stop!" says the martyr, "don't say 'in the name of God!'" Yet how many outrages are practiced under the garb of religion and sanctity! When, in synods and conferences, ministers of the Gospel are about to say something unbrotherly and unkind about a member, they almost always begin by being tremendously pious, the venom of their assault corresponding to the heavenly flavor of the prelude. Standing there, you would think they were ready to go right up into glory, and that nothing kept them down but the weight of their boots and overcoat, when suddenly the sheep bleat and the oxen bellow.

Oh, my dear friends, let us cultivate simplicity of Christian character! Jesus Christ said, "Unless you become as this little child, you cannot enter the kingdom of God." We may play hypocrite successfully now, but the Lord God will after awhile expose our true character. You must know the incident mentioned in the history of Ottacas, who was asked to kneel in the presence of Randolphus I.; and when before him he refused to do it, but after awhile he agreed to come in private when there was nobody in the king's tent, and then he would kneel down before him and worship; but the servants of the king had arranged it so that by drawing a cord the tent would suddenly drop. Ottacas after a while came in, and supposing he was in entire privacy, knelt before Randolphus. The servants pulled the cord, the tent dropped, and two armies surrounding looked down on Ottacas kneeling before Randolphus. If we are really kneeling to the world while we profess to be lowly subjects of Jesus Christ, the tent has already dropped, and all the hosts of heaven are gazing upon our hypocrisy. God's universe is a very public place, and you cannot hide hypocrisy in it. Going out into a world of delusion and sham, pretend to be no more than you really are. If you have the grace of God, profess it; profess no more than you have. But I want the world to know that where there is one hypocrite in the Church there are five hundred outside of it, for the reason that the field is larger. There are men in all circles who will bow before you, and who are obsequious in your presence and talk flatteringly, but who all the while in your conversation are digging for bait and angling for imperfections. In your presence they imply that they are everything friendly, but after a while you find they have the fierceness of a catamount, the slyness of a snake, and the spite of a devil. God will expose such. The gun they load will burst in their own hands; the lies they tell will break their own teeth; and at the very moment they think they have been successful in deceiving you and deceiving the world, the sheep will bleat and the oxen will bellow.

I learn further from this subject how natural it is to try to put off our sins on other people. Saul was charged with disobeying God. The man says it was not he; he did not save the sheep; the army did it—trying to throw it off on the shoulders of other people. Human nature is the same in all ages. You cannot throw off the responsibility of any sin upon the shoulders of other people.

Here is a young man who says, "I know I am doing wrong, but I have not had any chance. I had a father who despised God and a mother who was a disciple of godless fashion. I am not to blame for my sins—it is my bringing up." Ah no! that young man has been out in the world long enough to see what is right, and to see what is wrong, and in the great day of eternity he cannot throw his sins upon his father or mother, but will have to stand for himself and answer before God. You have had a conscience, you have had a Bible, and the influence of the Holy Spirit. Stand for yourself, or fall for yourself.

Here is a business man. He says, "I know I don't do exactly right in trade, but all the dry-goods men do it, and all the hardware men do this, and I am not responsible." You cannot throw off your sin upon the shoulders of other merchants. God will hold you responsible for what you do, and them responsible for what they do. I want to quote one passage of Scripture for you—I think it is in Proverbs: "If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself; but if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it."

I learn further from this subject what God meant by extermination. Saul was told to slay all the Amalekites, and the beasts in their possession. He saves Agag, the Amalekite king, and some of the sheep and oxen. God chastises him for it. God likes nothing done by halves. God will not stay in the soul that is half his and half the devil's. There may be more sins in our soul than there were Amalekites. We must kill them. Woe unto us if we spare Agag! Here is a Christian. He says: "I will drive out all the Amalekites of sin from my heart. Here is jealousy—down goes that Amalekite. Here is backbiting—down goes that Amalekite; and what slaughter he makes among his sins, striking right and left! What is that out yonder, lifting up his head? It is Agag—it is worldliness. It is an old sin he cannot bear to strike down. It is a darling transgression he cannot afford to sacrifice. Oh, my brethren, I appeal for entire consecration! Some of the Presbyterians call it the "higher life." The Methodists, I believe, call it "perfection." I do not care what you call it; without holiness no man shall see the Lord." I know men who are living with their soul in perpetual communion with Christ, and day by day are walking within sight of heaven. How do I know? They tell me so. I believe them. They would not lie about it. Why cannot we all have this consecration? Why slay some of the sins in our soul, and leave others to bleat and bellow for our exposure and condemnation? Christ will not stay in the same house with Agag. You must give up Agag, or give up Christ. Jesus says, "All of that heart or none." Saul slew the poorest of the sheep and the meanest of the oxen, and kept some of the finest and the fattest, and there are Christians who have slain the most unpopular of their transgressions, and saved those which are most respectable. It will not do. Eternal war against all the Amalekites; no mercy for Agag.

I learn further from this subject that it is vain to try to defraud God. He thought he had cheated God out of sheep and oxen; but he lost his crown and lost his empire. You cannot cheat out of a single cent. Here is one who has made ten thousand dollars of fraud. Before he dies every dollar will be gone, or it will give him unrest. Here is a Christian who has been largely prospered. He has given to God the proportion that is in charities and benevolences comes to the reckoning, and he is all away from you. How often have been that Christian men have had estate, and it is gone. The Lord came into the counting-room and said, "I have allowed you to have all the property for ten, fifteen, or twenty years; you have not done justice to your children. When the beggar calls you, you hounded him off you when my suffering children appeal to you for help, you had no mercy. You asked for so much, or so much, did not give it to me, and now I will take it all."

God asks of us one-seventh of us in the way of Sabbath. Do you we can get an hour of that time fully away from its true object? God has demanded one-seventh of time. If you take one hour of that time to be devoted to God's service instead of keeping his Sabbath, the purpose of writing up your sins, or making worldly gains, God will hour from you in some unexpected way. God says to Jonah, "You go to Nineveh. He says, 'No, I won't. I'll go to the sea.' The sea would not carry him; God's sea. The winds would blow him; they are God's winds. Let him attempt to do that which God forbids to do, or to go into a place which tells him not to go, the natural result is that God is against him. The angels are ready to strike him, the sun will burn him, the sun to smite him, the wind to drown him, and the earth to swallow him."

Those whose princely robes are out of heart's strings; those whose houses are built out of skulls; those whose springing fountains are the tears of oppressed nations—have they succeeded in cheating God? The last day will expose it—it will be found out on that day that God vindicated not only his justice and his mercy, but his power to take of his own rights and the rights of the Church, and the rights of his own children. Come, ye martyrs, awake! and come up from the dead, where folded darkness hearsed you, the chains like cankers peeled the skin, and wore off the flesh, and gnawed on the marrowless bones. Come, ye martyrs, dead, from the stakes where you were burned, where the arm upturned in mercy fell into the ashes, and the body was drowned in the snapping flame and the howling of the mountains of Piedmont and the valleys of Market, and London Tower, and the lands of Scotland. Gather in the procession, and together clap your hands, and together stamp your feet, and let the chains that bound you clank at once, and give the flames that burned you in one arm of fire, and plead for a judgment. Gather all the tears ye ever wept, and gather all the sighs ye ever breathed into a tempest, until the piercing chain-clank, and the tempest and the thunder-groan, announce, and hell and heaven a judgment! On that day God will vindicate his own and vindicate the cause of the oppressed! It will be that day that though we may have robbed God, we never have succeeded in robbing God.

My Christian friends, as you go into the world, exhibit an open-hearted Christian frankness. Do not be hypocritical in anything; you are never safe. At the most inopportune moment the sheep will bleat and the oxen will bellow. Drive out the last Amalekite of your soul. Have no mercy on your sins. Down with your sins; down with your pride; down with your worldliness; know you cannot achieve this by your own arm, but Almighty grace is sufficient—that which saved Joseph; that which delivered Daniel; that which shielded Shadrach from the fire; that which cheered Paul in the wreck.

A CHURCH ON THE WAVES.

Paul Floating Bethel and its Noble Work for Christ—A Centre of Gospel Activity—How its Work has Expanded.

WO or three minutes walk from the Union Depot in St. Paul, Minn., brings you to the Floating Bethel, a large boat anchored on the Mississippi river. The St. Paul Bethel Association was organized in December, 1872, as a result of several conferences held in St. Paul of the Y. M. C. A., to consider the question of reaching the unchurched. Rev. Robert Smith was elected pastor. He had devoted his time to preaching on the levee, visiting the river and lumber camps, and holding religious services as opportunity offered. Wimbear, Assistant Superintendent Bethel many are now interested in missions which have been started nearer their homes. The Boys' Brigade, under the direction of Mr. James Smith, numbers seventy members, who meet once a week on the Bethel to drill. When recruited they take a three-fold pledge, promising to abstain from tobacco, intoxicating liquors and profane language. Since its organization, boys who formerly spent their Sundays on the streets or in places of sin, are now attentive scholars in the Bethel Sunday School. It is believed that by thus interesting the boys and teaching them to be quick to think and act and to promptly obey, much good has been accomplished among them. The Christian Endeavor Society numbers twenty-seven members, with Mr. Geo. Engel as leader. They have a fine record and their efforts have resulted in the conversion of many. The Junior League, with the Misses Fletcher as leaders, is also a brave, earnest little band. Temperance meetings are held every Friday evening with good results, many having signed the pledge, while many more have promised to live Christian lives.

The Bethel Industrial School is an other excellent feature of the work. It has a very large attendance, the young girls meeting once a week through the winter months. They are taught to sew and model articles of clothing, and on payment of five cents the article upon which they have worked becomes their own. There is also a sewing day for the mothers, which is carried on in much the same manner, the women being taught to cut and make and remodel clothing.

twice in two for a night's lodging, or a meal. Good wholesome food, and as much as is desired, is furnished. This has been a very successful manner of working, and it has been extended to the unemployed of the city. Over a thousand were thus helped. Lodgings are furnished at ten cents a night or fifty cents a week and meals at seven cents.

More room is needed in all departments of the Bethel as its work broadens. Many thousands more may yet come under its helpful influences.

YOUNG PEOPLE IN COUNCIL.
Two Great Conventions in Session this Week in Toronto and Chattanooga, Tenn.

THIS is celebration week for the young people in two great denominations. On July 15 the Epworth League begins its convention at Toronto and the Baptist Young People's Union begins its convention at Chattanooga, Tenn. In both cases the meetings continue until Sunday, July 18.

The League has grown with marvelous rapidity, and its Convention will undoubtedly show the excellence of its work. Beginning on the lines of its elder sister, the Christian Endeavor Society, it has developed in its operations with the originality and energy peculiar to the Methodist Church. Its philanthropic extension is particularly notable, and has proved, as such work always does, a blessing to those who do it as well as to the beneficiaries. Like the Christian Endeavor Society, the League has also given special attention to foreign missions, and this subject occupies the most prominent place in the programme of the Convention. Besides this, the Departmental work is to have a more conspicuous place than heretofore. Eight conferences are to be held simultaneously on Friday morning in Massey Hall, the chief auditorium. The Theatre of the Normal School, and in six churches to take up the various phases of this work. Each will doubtless attract the delegates who in their home Leagues serve on these respective Committees. The subjects are Spiritual Work, Literary Work, Social Work, Finance, Mercy and Help, Correspondence, the Juniors, and Missions. In each practical papers

There is also a sewing day for the mothers, which is carried on in much the same manner, the women being taught to cut and make and remodel clothing.

The Mothers' Afternoon Tea has proved a blessing and a help. Many hundreds of women have come under the influence of good at these gatherings. None are so fallen that the Bethel is closed to them. The invitation to all is "Come!" The meeting is opened at 2:30 p.m., with singing and the Lord's Prayer. This is followed by a practical talk upon some one of the many topics of interest. Short addresses on the duties of motherhood, the training of children, on temperance, and on helpfulness to others, are a few of the topics touched upon at these meetings.

An artesian well supplies water for the Bethel, for baths and a swimming pool, and Wednesday afternoons and Friday evenings the baths are free. At other times the charge is ten cents. As soon as the "Friendly Inn" was opened many of the tramp class flocked to it, expecting to be housed and fed free; but it was deemed unwise to give strong men food and lodging, and it was decided that twenty sticks of maple wood should be sawed

The results of Conventions such as these must be as far-reaching as they are beneficial. Young people attending them come in contact with fellow-workers, who are fighting the Lord's battle in their respective neighborhoods, and learn from them how the great war is being prosecuted and gain new inspiration for service in their own fields.

The business of the Convention will include the presentation of the Prize Banners for excellence in the Christian Culture Courses of the Union; the presentation of reports from the officers of the Union and the conferences of State, Provincial and Associational Officers, of Junior Leaders, and of Christian Culture graduates, and the announcement of educational plans for the ensuing year. On Friday and Saturday there will be Sunrise prayer meetings in five churches and on Lookout Mountain, and the whole Convention will conclude with a great mass-meeting at which Rev. C. E. Woelfkin, of Brooklyn, will deliver a Consecration Address, and there will be a Consecration Service with roll-call of States and Provinces.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Paul Preaching at Athens.

Sunday School Lesson for July 25. Acts 17: 22-34. Golden Text: John 4: 24.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

THE brethren from Berea, who had succeeded in saving Paul from the persecuting Jews who had pursued him from Thessalonica, brought him by sea to Athens. This was a soil unlike any other in which he had been sent to sow the seed of the Word. Beautiful, artistic, refined, graceful, cultivated Athens! So sees man! Full of idols! So saw the man of God. The Apostle had sent word to Silas and Timothy to come to him with all speed, and while he waited for them his spirit was stirred within him when he saw, not the exquisite beauty of the statuary, the perfect proportions of the architecture, the perfection of the painting, in form and color, but the stamp of the world and the flesh and the devil upon all that met his eye. A city, the renown of which for learning and art had gone out into the whole of the known world, was in the eyes of Paul,

WHOLLY GIVEN TO IDOLATRY.

What should Paul do? How attack this fortress of the enemy? He "disputed in the synagogue with the Jews and the devout persons, and in the market daily with them that met with him." At Thessalonica Paul had reasoned with the Jews out of the Scriptures, and a great, deep and lasting work was done in only three days of such ministry. At Berea again it was the word which had been the power of God to convince the Bible-searching Jews and Gentiles in the synagogue. There at Athens no mention is made of the Scriptures, no quotation from them is recorded. Did Paul in some measure come under the power of the intellectual atmosphere in which he was placed, and substitute at Athens disputing and arguing about the truth for the plain unvarnished Word of God which it was his wont to use as his one weapon, his strong sword of the Spirit? Certain it is that the results of his work in Athens were the least remarkable in the whole of his missionary work, and we are led to conclude that this may be accounted for less from the difficulty of the circumstances than from the absence of the Word of God, the entrance of which brings light.

The most cultivated and learned of men are not won to God more easily by learned and cultivated Christians than by those that are simple and untaught. It is the spirit of God who does the work, and he knows how to choose his instruments. He can make use of the power of adaptability which some possess by nature, but the same power, used by man, is powerless to do the work of God. Possibly Paul thought he must meet the Athenians on their own ground. He learned once by the Spirit of God a divine adaptation in the spirit of a servant. (See 1 Cor. 9: 19-23.) Like his Master Paul came down to what he might lift them up. Put in our own case, we do not come down, we meet them on their own level.

In other places Paul had always seen some persons open to Christ before the spiritual darkness, and true proof of his reality was present as evidence of the power of his message. It was not so at Athens. But here, as elsewhere, the Gospel met with stout opposition. Certain philosophers of the Epicureans and of the Stoics encountered him. The pride of the heathen temple led Paul always to disputation with those who met him. "What will this fellow say? We heard him remark when he began to preach, that he seemed to be a teacher of strange deities." They brought him before the Court of the Areopagus, and Paul addressed this renowned assembly. It was

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY.

But it would seem as though, when he human adaptation, learning against learning, and philosophy against philosophy, characterized his speech: there was something of an appeal to man as man, it was a splendid argument, but it was not so much, as in most of his discourses, the authority of a man sent from God. The Apostle commenced by commenting on the worship of the Athenians, saying that they were "too superstitious." He had noticed among their altars the inscription, "To the unknown God," and taking occasion by this he said, "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, I declare unto you." Thus paving the way, he told them of the living God. "God that made the world and all things therein, seeing that he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with men's hands as though he needed anything, seeing he giveth to all life and breath and all things." It was one of the strongest arguments which could be addressed to human reason. Thousands of missionaries are continually using it. Yet when the heart is not gained, however much the mind may be convinced, the man remains an idolater still. If I acknowledge this true God, says the natural heart, I must bow to him, and it suits me better to have a god who is dependent upon me, on whom I can confer what gifts I will, to whom I can pray when I am in trouble, and whom I can set aside when I will. I cannot have a god who is to be really my master. How do I know it he would treat me well? The superstitious heathen fear their gods, but have no respect for them as being superior to themselves; all their worship is degrading, there is nothing elevating in heathen worship.

Paul went on to say, God "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed for their appointed seasons, and the bounds of their habitation, that they should seek the Lord." Here is the purpose and vocation of man's life that he should seek the Lord. God has created man with possibilities of intercourse with him. A man who does not seek the Lord is no more than an intelligent animal; the most noble part of his being has not come into play. But how is a heathen to seek the Lord? Paul shows "that they should seek the Lord if haply they might feel after him and find him, though he be not far from every one of us." Instances of this feeling after God, this recognition that there is one true God, and this intense cry after him, have been found by missionaries in many parts of the world in isolated cases among the heathen, showing how the Spirit of God works even among them.

And now Paul, instead of quoting, as was his wont, from the Word of God, quotes from the Greek poets. "For in him we live and move and have our being, as certain of your own poets have said, for we are also his offspring." How likely it would seem to us, would such words be to convince these Greeks; they would see that Paul had been a student, and that he was familiar with their literature; he was not a base fellow, as they had thought. He appealed to them on the principles which they professed to hold; can they remain unconvinced? Alas! for the most part they did. All this human power did not bring them into the presence of God, those strong words of Peter did the Jew, when, on the day of Pentecost, he had brought up Scripture after Scripture, and then showed the assembled company their guilt in having crucified the Christ. Then men were "pricked to the heart;" now, in Athens, it was otherwise; little heart work was done.

What followed? "When they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked; and others said, We will hear thee again of this matter." But no church was founded at Athens. God, however, did not leave his Word without witness. Certain men came unto him believed. One of them was "Dionysius the Areopagite." It was something that one in that august assembly should be on the Lord's side, "and a woman named Damaris, and others with them." The converts were so few that the names of two are mentioned. This was not so elsewhere.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

A NEW view of Paul's wonderful personality is presented in the lesson. His behaviour when brought face to face with idolatry in its most cultivated form; and his oration when hurried, without time for preparation, into the presence of the most learned and critical audience of that day, are alike interesting and instructive. Art had reached its highest Jewish monotheistic doctrine. But there were other opportunities of delivering his message. The market-place in Athens was a common meeting-place where philosophers and teachers were wont to go, to talk in Socratic fashion with the people. Thither Paul went with the statues of the gods around the temples open on every side, with the people he met, doubtless pointing out to them the absurdity of their worship. How long this continued we are not told, but at last his teaching became known to the leading philosophers of the city, Epicureans, who lived for pleasure and self-indulgence, and the Stoics, who professed to despise outward conditions, expected as their highest attainment absorbed after death into an impersonal godhead, were the chief schools of philosophy. To them Paul seemed a babbler—a splitter of hairs, as we say, but he might be worth hearing, perhaps he had stumbled on some new truth. So they courteously invited him to the Areopagus, the chief council city. His address was the mastery of a Christian orator. We have only a line of it in our lesson, but it is consummate tact and skill. We have expected Paul to be out of element in addressing an audience composed of men so different from those whom he usually spoke. It would have been useless to quote the Jewish Scriptures to an Athenian audience, which had never heard of them, and which have derided him and his teaching. But, taking his text from Cleanthes, one of the Stoic poets, he preached to the God to whom they ascribed divinity, as he reminded them, he built an altar—the altar to the unknown God. His sermon was a new word to preachers of the Gospel. It began as Peter began his sermon at Pentecost and, as all the world knows, Paul's preaching must have been with something the same result. He believed and then he went to higher truths. He believed that man was the image of God, then he went to the father from whom he should not think of himself as an insensate marble, but as a being who might be worshipped an unknown God, and it was he that preached. In this way he avoided the offence of preaching strange gods, which was a capital offence at Athens. By well chosen words he led his hearers to the point of righteousness, judgment by Christ's death. So long as the course dealt with the things they listened, but when he began to show them the accountability they gave offence and the audience broke up. But Dionysius, the Areopagite, and his judges were won to Christ.

considering the dignity of an Areopagite, was no small triumph. In Athens, only one convert, a woman, is mentioned by name, but there were others. Eventually a church was founded, and it became influential and did valuable service to the cause of Christ.

Certain of your own poets have said. It would have been worse than to quote Scripture to the proud Areopagite who despised the Jews and their prophets. Paul enlisted their attention by an authority they did respect. The poet Cleanthes who wrote:

All things that we are greet with praise
It is meet that mortals call with one
For we thine offspring are, and we all
Of all that live and move upon this earth
Receive the gift of imitative speech.

In quoting from these lines Paul showed his heaven-given wisdom, as the how illogical it was for men to think that they had made with their hands.

Certain men came unto him and believed. In the year 125 the church which Paul planted at Athens became a vigorous church. Some of the most noble books on Christianity emanated from members. Tradition says that Paul became the pastor of it and that faithful even to death. His name is among the early martyrs.

SHELTERING INDIA'S STARVING WIDOWS.

Institution Established by Pandita Ramabai Crowded by Widows and Little Girls—Ramabai's Early Sufferings—Letters from Grateful Missionaries.

EXT to the children, the greatest sufferers by the famine in India have been the widows, whose lot under the most favorable circumstances is always pitiful. Prejudice is strong against their contracting a second marriage, even when, very often happens, their deceased husbands were boys of six or seven years old died before married life began. Early widows cast themselves into the river, which their husbands' bodies were found, believing that only in that way they rejoin them in the next life. So severe was this practice that in the year 1817, when public opinion was stirred up, it is on official record that seven hundred widows thus perished in Bengal. In 1829 the British authorities passed an act by statute, thereby causing a great opposition from the religious fanatics of the people. They persisted, and a further statute provided for the trial of any person assisting or interfering at such a sacrifice of life, on a charge of culpable homicide. Since then the widows have been permitted to live, but their heads are shaven and remain a burden on the hands of their relatives. In time of famine these widows were the first to feel the pinch of poverty. Their lot aroused the sympathy of that noble lady, Pandita Ramabai, who during her education in England won respect and admiration for her many noble efforts to return to her native land and there devote her life to the education of the poor. The number of widows who have applied to her for help during the last few months have been so great that she has received all the help she can give, relying on God to supply the means. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent her a thousand dollars from America, which would do much to relieve her anxieties. On this page we give a portrait of this brave lady with a group of her widows. Two appear in the vignette. Second, the intelligent woman on the left, wearing a white sari, is Ramabai's chief assistant, whose serious and educational work has been most valuable. With her we give also two pictures of "Famine widows." The first is the name, the first as she is, most unclothed, with her head and attenuated body so miserable that she lamented that her death would come after the famine. Then death by fire would have put a speedy end to her sufferings; the other is of the same woman after she had enjoyed a year of Christian care and kindness. Ramabai's work is a kind of transformation, and its beneficence is to the most sceptical. Ramabai was herself a famine child. At the great famine in 1877 she was a child of her teens the youngest and best of her parents who were of the caste. Gradually all their money went for food, the famine prices being then, as now, advanced beyond the reach of the poor. She saw her father die of starvation; then her mother fell with the fever that comes of hunger and died pitifully pleading for only a morsel of bread. Then her elder sister died of the same awful want and Ramabai and her brother wandered through the country seeking work. Finally they reached Calcutta where the brother obtained employment; but the months of cruel suffering when he and his sister often were unable to get food for four or five days at a time had undermined his constitution and he too died. Ramabai was left alone, but her beauty and still more the learning, which had won her the coveted title of Sarasvati, brought her friends who cared for her. Ultimately she married a Bengali gentleman and for about a year and a half she tasted the sweets of domestic happiness. A baby girl came to bless the union, but sorrow seemed reluctant to relax its grip on the devoted woman. After a brief illness her husband died and again Ramabai had to face the world and support herself and child. Through the kindness of friends she was enabled to go to England, where, for a year or two, she supported herself at a college at Cheltenham by teaching Sanscrit. Then she came to America and spent five years in practical work. Her heart was set on giving relief to the widows among her people, and her pathetic story of their lot won the sympathy of Christian people wherever she went. When she returned to India she took with her sufficient funds to establish the home, the name of which, Sharada Sadan (the abode of wisdom), became dear to many a hopeless widow. Chiefly through American gifts Ramabai has been enabled to carry on this home to the present time. Again the country is passing through the horrors of famine, and Ramabai has, with the sympathy born of bitter experience, ine. Pandita Ramabai says: "It is impossible for the Government officers alone to look after the little children and to protect the virtue of young women and girls. twelve baskets of stone, and carry it to the appointed place, and who cannot get their wages at the Relief Camps unless they do so much work every day, need our help. The sad sight of aged men and delicate women stretching forth their sore hands and begging you to help, them, pouring out their sorrows into your ears, and lamenting over their hard fate, while their tearful eyes look straight into yours to find out if there were a particle of sympathy for them, is altogether too much to bear for a person having a heart of flesh.

"Why do not good Christian people in England and America send money to the missionaries in this country, who are so anxious to help the poor people, and are trying hard to do as much as they can for them, but cannot do more for want of means? The great motherly heart of missionary ladies is yearning for the dying children and other poor of the Central Provinces. Let benevolent people send generous donations to them for feeding and caring for the Lord's little ones. Men can do much, but all goodly women must come forward at this time, and care for little children and protect young women whom the Government officials are not able to help and care for. It is woman's work and cannot be left to the officers and their subordinates. My sympathies are excited by the needs of young girl-widows especially, at this time. To let them go to the Relief Camps and Poor Houses, or allow them to wander in the streets and on the highways, means their eternal destruction. I humbly request you to pray for me and mine, that we may be made strong in the Lord, and walk by faith and not by sight."

Rev. Robert W. Der, Presbyterian Missionary at Poonah, to whom we are indebted for the photographs of Pandita Ramabai, and her widows, speaks in the highest terms of her character and work. He has personally witnessed her efforts on behalf of her unhappy sisters, and has seen the results. He says that the training she is giving the poor girls fits them for useful careers, and that many who have heard of Christ through her will become missionaries to their Hindoo sisters whom American and English missionaries could never reach.

At the same time that help was sent to Ramabai, a remittance was sent to Rev.

the famine: the crops in these parts have been almost a failure for four years and great numbers had perished from starvation before it was recognized that we were famine-stricken. In parts of the district the death rate is 626 out of 1,000 for the year, where the average rate is 50 to 1,000 for the year. The distress is beyond description.

"Beside being associated with Relief Committees in general relief work, we are doing what we can to give homes to orphan children. We have provided for several hundred of them; and many hundreds more right around us must be provided for or perish. To provide premises for and to undertake the support of these helpless ones a great financial responsibility must be assumed. Our missionary society is so heavily burdened that it cannot authorize additional expenditure and a great question now facing me—as well as others—is, shall I personally assume this additional responsibility or let the helpless children at my door perish? I have already assumed a great deal and must confess I do not now know what to do. Merciful Father, direct me!"

Bishop Thoburn writes: "I called a large committee of eighteen missionaries in order to get the fullest possible reports and to provide for a wide and careful distribution of the funds. As the famine fluctuates, growing worse in some districts and abating in others, I have called a second meeting for next week in order to revise our basis of distribution and provide for new contingencies which have arisen. The prompt and very generous help sent to India by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been fully appreciated, and I need hardly say it has been most timely. The reports received late last night indicate that the number of starving people receiving relief from Government had increased over 150,000 during the week. We are now watching with intense eagerness for reports of the coming rains, which usually begin in Southern Ceylon about this date, and slowly work their way along the Southwestern coast of India. We cannot hope for any abatement of the famine until these rains begin, but after they fully set in we must wait four months until seed can be sown and the various crops grow to maturity and be harvested. You will thus see that at the very best the situation is still extremely grave."

Col. Ishwa Das, of the Salvation Army, writes: "We have received the remittance of $500 and thank you for the same. Our command in North India comprises the North-West Provinces and Oudh and the Punjab, and, as you are probably aware, they are the parts of India most affected by the present famine. To see the famine at its worst, it is necessary to go into the valleys, amongst the agricultural classes. This explains why some newspaper reporters and artists come out to India, visit the large cities and see so little of the famine."

SLAIN BY TREACHERY.

WAZIRI WARRIOR.

THE cable brings news of a disaster to a British force in that wild and half-civilized region lying between British India and Afghanistan, which is inhabited by the Waziris. A political officer of the Anglo Indian Government was sent last month into the district to select a site for a new outpost and to collect a fine due for some misconduct on the part of the local government.

He was escorted by native troops with British officers. They were cruelly received by the Waziris and ended at the village of Maidda Khan the chief man, a scribe, spread luncheon for his visitors. The officers, who had just finished a meal, when a number of them opened fire upon them from numerous small towers erected for the protection of the village. So short was the range and so well directed the fire, that six of the officers fell dead as they lay on the other three were severely wounded. The escort of Medani Sikhs was at the same time cut off by about a hundred members of the tribe. One officer and twenty men were slain and twenty others were wounded. The British succeeded in escaping from the village, but were followed by the tribesmen. The Medanis behaved with cowardice. For about four days they continued to retreat into open country, carrying their wounded comrades, their enemies, under cover of the night, poured a galling fire upon them. The Waziris, reinforced as the retreat went on, were about fifteen hundred strong against the little Mohammedan force. The latter would have been crushed if it had not been for help from Datta-khel, where the sound of firing had given warning of the disaster. The appearance of this help encouraged the Waziris; and a detachment, which was coming over to cut off the retreat, returned to firing a shot. The little force and its retreat without further delay, and reached Datta-Khel in the night. The Waziris are a warlike race who have never been brought under subjugation, but operated with equal readiness against the Afghans on the west and the British on the east. Nominally they were under the government of the Amir of Afghanistan, but he had never been able to subdue them, and was in continual dispute with the British on their account. Some time ago he made an arrangement with the Anglo-Indian Government by which he was relieved of responsibility for the unruly Waziris, and the British were to take the charge of them. Probably the Waziris were unaware of the change. We were surprised when, after one of their raids, they were required to make amends. The insignificance of the demand may have misled them as to the power of their enemy and led them to the consequences to be meted out to them for an act of treachery. They are probably now congratulating themselves on their prowess, little knowing how severe will be their punishment. The situation is plain enough to us to induce a feeling of pity for the men who have thus provoked a power capable of inflicting a terrible punishment. It is so that the Christian regards the reckless and persistent offenders against God. He knows how awful must be the doom of those who defy him and despise his government.

Thou thoughtest I was altogether such an one as myself: but I will reprove thee. . . . Consider this ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces and there be none to deliver. (Ps 50: 21.)

Finding Egypt's First King.

From M. de Morgan's story in the New York Herald, it would appear that he has found the body of the first king of that first dynasty of Egypt, who reigned about 6000 years ago. M. de Morgan's success in finding the mummies of King Amenemhat II. and Princess Naub-Hatep two years ago, encouraged him to make further search in the neighborhood of Abydos and along the Nile valley between the ancient city and Thebes. His search has been rewarded by the discovery of a tomb which he believes to be older than any yet have been expended in the preservation of the body by the fact that it remains intact at the close of nearly seven thousand years. The Egyptians thought that immortality depended on such preservation. They had not the better hope which supported the great Apostle and made him indifferent to the disposal of his body.

For we know that if the earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. (1. Cor. 5: 1.)

An Unwelcome Tenant.

A lady who lives a few miles from Binghampton, N. Y., has had an unpleasant experience. She is a maiden lady who takes a great pride in the immaculate cleanliness and tidiness of her home. A few weeks ago she went on a visit to her sister who lives in another town, and locked up her home. Shortly after her departure, a tramp passing, noticed the unoccupied appearance of the house and effected an entrance. He made himself quite at home, built a fire in the kitchen, killed and cooked the lady's chickens, smoked in her parlor, and slept on her best bed. He found plenty of household stores, and there were vegetables and fruit in her garden which he used freely. For two weeks he lived in the house unmolested, dirtying and defiling the rooms and the furniture which were the owner's pride. The whole house reeked with his tobacco smoke, which is the lady's special abomination, and the signs of his foul presence were everywhere to be seen. His stay, however, came to an abrupt end when the lady's brother, calling to see her, found him there and handed him over to the police. The lady was sent for and was his skill from surgeons all over Europe. We may hope that a youth who has had his life saved by having his heart washed, may have his soul saved by the cleansing of his heart from moral impurities, so that he may enjoy eternal life. This he may have by offering David's prayer:

Create in me a clean heart, O God. (Ps. 51: 10.)

Eophones for Revenue Cutters.

The appropriation by Congress of twelve thousand dollars for supplying revenue cutters with eophones, concedes the practical value of those instruments. The eophone is a sound-catching device, its purpose being the determination with accuracy, in a fog or darkness, of the location of sound, both as to the direction and distance. It is formed of two bell-mouthed receivers, placed one on each side of a sheet of metal or other material, extending some distance in front of the receiver. A tube from the left-hand sound receiver is placed at the left ear of the person operating the eophone, and a tube from the right-hand receiver at the right ear. When the sound is heard with equal plainness in both ears, the instrument is pointing in the direction of the sound; when, however, the sound is heard with greater plainness in one ear than in the other, the instrument is pointing at an angle with the direction of the sound. The sensitiveness possessed by this peculiarity of construction is said to be very remarkable. The instrument is attached to the top of the pilot house, the tubes from the receivers being brought inside the house for use by the pilot. The eophone warns the pilot of the approach of danger and of its location. That is all that is necessary, as he will shape his course to avoid it. Unhappily, so much cannot be said of moral and spiritual dangers. Men do not avoid them, though they know of their existence and have been warned against them.

He that being often reproved hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed and that without remedy. (Prov. 29: 1.)

Asleep at His Post.

A singular escape from accident occurred on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near Cumberland, Md., recently. A locomotive was in use near some brick-works shifting freight. Two cars, one of which was a caboose and the other laden with lime, were run on to a siding while the locomotive went to bring up other cars to make up a train. While he was attending to his duty the engineer saw, to his consternation, the two cars glide slowly along the siding on to the main line where there is a steep grade. When they reached the grade their speed rapidly increased and they were soon flying at a furious rate toward Cumberland eighteen miles away. The engineer put on all his steam and started in pursuit. He knew there was a flagman in the caboose, so he whistled for brakes, but there was no response. He continued the pursuit until he reached a sharp curve, which the runaway cars passed safely, but the engine was derailed and went some distance ploughing the track before it could be stopped. Happily no one was hurt, and the runaway cars came to an up-grade which brought them to a standstill just outside Cumberland. It was almost the only hour of the day when such an accident could have occurred without involving a deplorable loss of life. As it was, a work-train on the line had been side-tracked only a few minutes before the runaway cars went flying along the track. A subsequent inquiry elicited the fact that the flagman in the caboose had fallen asleep and had not been awakened by the wild ride, or by the whistles of the locomotive. He may be thankful that his nap did not cost him his life and the lives of others. He doubtless thought himself secure when he went to sleep, as many who travel the downward road of sin. They, too, are often unconscious of their peril and heedless of the warnings of those who would save them. There are many who are in need of the Apostle's solemn warning.

Awake thou that sleepest and arise from the dead and Christ shall give thee light. (Eph. 5: 14.)

opened. It was covered deep with the sand of ages, but when that was cleared away a huge quadrangular elevation was laid bare. Prying out one of the huge stones, an opening was disclosed, through which a subterranean passage was reached. M. de Morgan and his party descended a long gloomy tunnel from which galleries turned out at intervals. Pursuing the main tunnel, the walls of which were elaborately carved with figures of fishes, turtles, and birds, they came to a suite of twenty-one large rooms. The central room was evidently the most important. A beautifully carved statue in wood stood at the head of the sarcophagus, representing a man of fine proportions. On the walls were inscriptions and pictures cut deep into the stone, portraying the king's life from the cradle to the grave. The inscriptions on the sarcophagus were in figures much older than any others yet deciphered, and their shape, and especially the lines enclosing the name of the king, which are usually oval, but in this case were square, indicated that the king belonged to the first dynasty. It, as seems probable from the position and grandeur of the chamber, it was the tomb of the founder of the dynasty, the body must be that of Mena, who, according to Manetho, reigned nearly five thousand years before Christ. He reigned sixty-two years and was if we trust the pictures, a king mighty in war and magnificent in peace. We may judge what care must be almost distracted by the spoliation of her pretty home. Her annoyance can easily be understood, but she will soon restore her house to its former condition. It is not so easy to rid the heart of its bad lodgers and remove the signs of their stay. When evil thoughts and passions take possession of the soul, it is difficult to eject them, and their pollution is too often permanent. They who have once been delivered need to exercise constant care lest they return.

When he cometh he findeth it swept and garnished. Then goeth he and taketh to him seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and they enter in and dwell there. (Luke 11: 25, 26.)

Novel Surgery.

A medical journal publishes the report of an extraordinary surgical operation performed at Parma, Italy. This operation was nothing less than the washing of a patient's heart, removing from it impurities which would in a short time have caused fatal disease. The operating surgeon used a new apparatus, recently invented by Professor Riva. After making the necessary incision, Professor Verdelli first cleaned the pericardium of the patient, a twelve-year-old boy, of the pus which had there accumulated, and then proceeded to wash the heart with a strong solution of borax. The operation was entirely successful. No such operation has ever been attempted before, and the eminent physician has received numerous appreciative communications relating to

HAPPY GUESTS

AT MONT-LAWN.

How the Glorious Fourth was Celebrated at Our Children's Home—"Little No. 6,000."

INDEPENDENCE Day is always a joyous occasion at Mont-Lawn, and this year it was celebrated in truly patriotic fashion. Immediately after breakfast on the "glorious Fourth," the children—considerably over 200 strong—gathered around the Liberty Pole and sang with sturdy enthusiasm, "The Star Spangled Banner," while a beautiful new silk flag, the gift of Dr. Klopsch, was raised, its graceful folds floating out on the breeze that came up from the valley of the Hudson. At ten o'clock, the youngsters assembled in the chapel, where for an hour patriotic exercises were held, consisting of readings, recitations, and the singing of patriotic songs. Then came the distribution of firecrackers to the boys and torpedoes to the girls, and the rest of the forenoon was an uninterrupted carnival of pleasure for the children. At noon a special dessert of good things was served in honor of the day, and the afternoon was devoted to games, which occupied the hours pleasantly till the early evening meal. This was supplemented by a dish of delicious ice-cream for every one of the children, and then, with the approaching dusk, came the great event of the day, to which the little folks had been looking forward with eager anticipation for over a week past—the fine display of fireworks which Dr. Klopsch provides for the Home children every Fourth of July. This year the show was especially brilliant, with a number of combination exhibition pieces, including the "Fire Fly Dart," "The Peacock's Fan," "The Merry Frolic," and a dazzling assortment of pin-wheels, colored sky-rockets, roman candles, mines, bouquets of flowers, and vari-colored lights. There were many exclamations of wonder and delight as the Mont-Lawn heights and the entire valley down to the river, were illuminated by the alternate glow of green, red, blue, yellow and white. Several hundred spectators witnessed the exhibition, a number being guests who had come to the Home during the early evening, while others were residents of the surrounding country, who had been attracted by the pyrotechnic show. By one o'clock the last firework had been exploded, the visitors had gone, some in carriages, some on foot, and the peaceful calm of a summer night prevailed. In the moonlight, the tired but happy children, having had their good night prayer, were snugly tucked in between cool, white sheets, and all were soon fast asleep and dreaming over again in their dreams the pleasures of the day.

There are wonderful possibilities for the artist or photographer at Mont-Lawn. The groups of merry children at their sports, racing over the grass, swimming or picking wild flowers; the juvenile procession as it forms on the lawn and marches to the little chapel for the ritual of the drum; the "trooping of the colors," a pretty semi-military manoeuvre in which both boys and girls join, on their way to the big tent, all carrying American flags and shouting "Old Glory" as they file past the flag pole—these are scenes worth the highest art of the painter. But what camera or brush can reproduce the sparkle that dances in the eyes of the children, the sweet cadence of their voices in hymn and song, the pealing laughter such as one cannot hear in city alleys, but which wells up naturally to the lips of even the children of the slums when they are amid green woods and flowery lanes? If the patrons who contribute to the support of the Home could but see the children to whom they have given such a pleasant holiday—little waifs like Johnny M—the hunchback, and wee, lame, barefooted and ragged tots, who are simply wild with delight every waking hour of the long summer day—they would utter a prayer of thankfulness as they recalled the Divine words: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, . . . ye did it unto Me."

Among the arrivals at the Home during the week was one who had the distinction of being the six thousandth child received at Mont-Lawn since the Home first opened in 1894. Little Rachel K. is a sweet and gentle child, pleasing in disposition and with a bright intelligent face. She is not yet thirteen, but her heart has already been given to Christ. She declares with childish determination that she means to be a missionary and work for the Master. Rachel, who is the eldest of a family of six poor tenement children, is a prime favorite with all at the Home.

During the last two weeks, the intensely hot weather has caused much sickness among the poor tenement children of the city. Scorching sidewalks, oven like alleys and close courts are not conducive to either health or happiness, and the little ones are more the victims of such conditions than the adults. Their poor, weakly bodies, and their wan, pinched faces, must touch the heart of anyone who visits in a tenement quarter at this season of the year. To save the lives of as many of these little ones as possible, and to give them a brief season of happiness such as only a few of them have ever known, is but a part of the mission of our Fresh-Air Fund. At Mont-Lawn the children are in a Christian home, where, in addition to grand physical advantages and healthful recreation, they are taught to understand simple spiritual truths; and the seed of true religion thus prayerfully sown, influences the whole life and character afterward.

We trust, with the aid of our readers, to be able to send a large number of needy tenement waifs to Mont-Lawn this year and with that object in view we invite all who have the cause of the helpless little ones at heart to contribute as liberally as possible. All gifts will be promptly acknowledged in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Drawn by a Mother's Prayers.

In a well-known church (so the pastor relates) a new convert lately came to confer with the session, and he was asked what sermons were the special means of his awakening. He answered very simply that his change was not due to any sermons or recent means, but to his mother. She had been in her grave more than forty years. She had died in the bloom of her beauty and maternity when he was a boy of six. But, he explained, she was a Christian woman, and she had begun, when he was a mere child, to instruct her eldest born in the truth. It was the power of those teachings over his infant mind, and especially of the dying scene, which were the instruments for bringing him back to God. When this young mother was about to die, she had gathered her little flock at her bed-side, she laid her dying hand upon his head, and had charged him, her first-born, his mother's God and remembered instructions. That hand had been laid ever since, through the long years of his worldliness; he had felt it always, and it was this which brought him back to God.

Scrap Books for Children.

THERE are times, in every home, when the little folks, grown weary of their playthings, doors and out, cast about for some new amusement. These hours when the thoughtful mother draw the youngsters to herself a pair of old scissors, some picture old illustrated papers, and several of good stout manila paper, show how they may compile such a book as will afford many hours of Mary J. Strayer, in The Home Companion, gives a few simple rules for the making of a child's scrap book. She says:

"A shoe box will serve nicely as a receptacle for the pictures. Now, cut a tablet of the heavy paper, if possible, six inches in length by six in width. Then, fold the leaves and fold them in pairs. Sew these inside a strong paper cover cut the same size. Buy little books containing ten pages each, made, and if sewn with bright colored or worsted, are made still more attractive. Supply the child with smooth paper, a small brush, and teach him to paste neatly. Show him the importance of placing the picture straight, and in the middle of the page. TRUE WORSHIP.

Worship Acceptable to God and Beneficial to the Worshiper.

Nothing is more remarkable in the history of religion than the tendency to artificiality and the mechanical. It appears through the ages like the action of a powerful spring, or the gravity of a heavy stone. Prophet after prophet uttered his denunciation of it, yet no man was his voice silent in death, than the people turned from heart religion to creeds and rites and ceremonies. Orthodoxy was held in higher esteem than sincerity. The stamp on the face of more importance than the metal. If the man observed forms, was regular in attendance at worship, if he could use the current phrases of theology correctly, was in his opinions, and especially if his sermons were punctuated, his place was secure in the roll of religious men. He inquired as to his private life, his domestic life, and his personal purity was important. Christ found these conditions and came and pronounced woe upon them. He set no limits to his denunciations. The men who were in the high places were whitened sepulchres, beautiful but full of death and corruption. Their long prayers, their endless fasts, their ostentatious almsgiving were disgusting to him, and he who had only a heart of tenderness and affectionate solicitude for the open sinner who repented, had only a withering scorn for these sinners who concealed their wickedness beneath the cloak of punctilious observance. He did the same work in his day, and vicious men trying to compound with God, by offering him the mass and the sacrament instead of the clean life and a pure heart. Wesley and Whitehead took up the burden; and in our day, the same teaching has to be given from many a pulpit. In spite of reiterated warnings, there are multitudes who with incurable perversity misinterpret the service God requires of his people. It is not long since a traveler in Tyrol found bandits who lived by robbery and murder, yet were very particular not to eat meat on Fridays. Among these there are many whose hopes for a better life are based on the fact that the priest has sprinkled them and some who have confirmed them, or that they have been baptised by trine immersion, backward or forward movement, or that they have kept the seventh day instead of the first day of the Sabbath, or that years ago, they have passed through an agony of contrition at the altar, and found peace. To suffer, or to suffer, is always easier than to do right. Opinion and orthodoxy and observance are so much less costly than character. Men could be saved by attending to ecclesiastical building where "divine service" is performed, no one need be troubled to go through prescribed forms and take part in ancient, time-honored ceremonies may be conducive to right living, and no one should utter a word against them. Christ had nothing to say against prayer, or fasting, or almsgiving, but if he supposed that merit was to be gained by them, or that God would accept of them in the place of heart-religion, they were making a fatal mistake. In the passage referred to for the topic (Matt. 6: 1-15), Jesus referred to a class which left God out of their consideration entirely in their observances. They did them to be seen of men. In some of our fashionable churches and in some that are unfashionable the same class may be seen now. As he said almost scornfully, "they seek their reward." They are seen of men and are respected for their piety; they have the thing they sought and nothing more. The thing they were supposed to be seeking—the approval of God, they forgot. We realize the fact in our lives in the family and the home. The father would be satisfied with a son who said words were respectful and who obeyed the rules of the household, if there was no love in his heart and if his life was not pure and his disposition coarse and unkind. How much more is character essential when we approach One, to whose thoughts and intents of the heart are laid open! The service of the lips alone without the service of heart and life can never satisfy God.

MY TRYST.

"O that I knew where I might find him."

FAITHFULLY keep my tryst with God,
And softly steal up the stair,
And ponder a page of the blessed Word,
And cast at his feet my care.

I seek the place where the faithful few
Are gathered for praise and prayer,
No voice from heaven, no cloven tongue,
Yet the Lord himself is there.

I set apart his holy day,
Barring out the great world's din;
And the Lord fulfils his promises,
The opened door entering in.

For my heart cries out for thee, O God,
And I long for the living bread;
For the seed thou didst sow in my stony heart,
Is a growing thing, not dead.

So I see my God in moon and star,
He shines on me through the day;
I hear his voice in the passing wind,
And the waves that plash in the bay.

I see my God in my daily lot,
As I follow the path he trod.
To live and love reveals his face,
For life and love are God.

—MRS. MARY W. BOARDMAN.

SEEK THE LORD.

SEEK the Lord while he is near thee,
Seek him while he may be found,
Seek the Lord while he will hear thee,
Let his grace to you abound.

Seek the Lord, O, early seek him,
Now his loving call obey;
He bestows abundant pardon—
Seek the Lord to-day—to-day.

Seek the blessings of salvation,
And you shall not seek in vain,
'Twas for you from earth's foundation
Christ, the Lamb, for you was slain.
Seek the Lord, your sin confessing,
Seek the path the Saviour trod,
Seek the Lord and know the blessing
Of a soul at peace with God.
Seek the Lord—O, now believe him—
Seek the way to heaven above;
Seek the Lord, no longer grieve him,
Do not slight his dying love.

—MRS. FRANK A. BRECK.

LIGHT AT EVENTIDE.

FAINT not, the miles to heaven are few,
Short is the onward way,
Until we reach the bound of life
At close of earthly day.
Many the weary heads that lie
Upon the Saviour's breast,
But there is room for all who come,
For yours, among the rest.
Beloved, when you reach life's end,
Death's valley dark to sight,
You'll find the shadows flee away—
At eventide 'tis light.
"A light that ne'er on sea or land"
Shone with its pure sweet ray,
Fills all the vale with wondrous charm,
The dawn of heavenly day.
The Saviour's face, Death's waters gilds
With—His own glory bright,
It is the shining there because
The Lord himself is light.
No night shall follow this sweet morn,
There shall be no more pain,
No aching heart—earth's notes of woe
Lost in joy's long refrain.

Our Closing Dispensation.

Indications in Scripture that this is the Last Age, and that it is Nearing its Close.

BY REV. FRANK WHITE.

Considering this subject I have taken the term dispensation in its popular or true sense, yet not excluding its more Scriptural use of economy, or a particular form of the divine administration, ordered with a view to the fulfilment of his purpose "who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, to whom be glory forever."

The Jews divided all time into "this age" and "that which is to come," the advent of their Messiah marking the transition from the one to the other. This twofold division is expressly sanctioned by the Scriptures. Both our Lord and his Apostles observe the same distinction. (Luke 18: 29, 30.) "Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife or children for the Kingdom of God's sake, but he shall receive manifold more in this present time and in the world [age] to come life everlasting." (In Eph. 1: 20, 21.) The Apostle Paul speaks of Christ as "raised from the dead and set at God's right hand in the heavenly place, far above all principality and power and might and dominion and every name that is named, not only in this world [age] but also in that which is to come."

So in Titus 3: 1, 2: "For the Grace of God, that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world [age]."

This last Scripture is one of the very many which determine the future limits of the present dispensation. It is in harmony with the Jewish belief that the conclusion of this age and the commencement of the age to come are inseparable from our Lord's revelation in glory. It also shows that no intermediate object of hope is presented to a suffering and expectant Church.

Our honored brother, Dr. Saphir, compared the several periods preceding Messiah's advent to so many bridges under which the stream of time ran to finally meet in the fair Millennial Waters. Within the span of this bridge are several successive arches, each complete in itself. The first arch extends from Adam to the flood. The second arch, from the flood to the call of Abraham. The third arch, from Abraham to Moses. The fourth arch, from Moses to Christ. The fifth arch, from Christ to the first Resurrection, and the time when he shall come to be glorified of his saints, and admired of all of them that believe.

We are living under the last arch, widened, may I so say, by Israel's rejection of Messiah. On us "the end of the ages"—and may we not say the end of the end of ages are come—not only the last days, but the last hours of these last days. We say this, not from chronological comparisons but because of the rapid development of significant events, and the presence, so strongly marked, of those moral features, which from the word of inspiration, we are told, must characterize the time of the very end.

In the last days, perilous, difficult, embarrassing, times shall come, says the Apostle Paul; and then follows a description of these times—and a fearful picture it is. But study it, look not only at its general outlines, but its minutest details and then say, Is not the professing Christianity of our day surely, rapidly, developing into its exact likeness? The increasing spirit of opposition to a distinctive Christianity—the systematic substitution of a lie for every precious Gospel truth, betokens the time of the end and the hour of the manifestation of that wicked one whom the Lord shall destroy with the brightness of his coming.

Equally express is the teaching of II. Thess. 1: 1, a portion full of consolation to afflicted and persecuted saints; for it reveals, as their ultimate portion, rest, sweet rest—rest in the sense of complete exemption from tribulation and suffering. But when? That is the question. Mark the answer: "Rest with us when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven [not sooner, not later] with his mighty angels in flaming fire."

A STORY OF THE BROADER CHRIST-LIFE

WRITTEN SPECIALLY FOR THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

CHAPTER XVI Concluded
Thy Kingdom Come.

BY

AMELIA E. BARR.

FORTUNATELY there were late photographs of Steve, and John gave these to men who were familiar with the country, and lavished gold in searching every foot of ground in the city and in the adjacent towns and villages. Nothing came of the quest, and finally John was compelled to return home. Still he would not give up hope. He reminded Jessie of Steve's erratic impulses to seclusion, and of that habit he had of sinking his identity in some workmanlike disguise; and he thought it probable that he had done so, in order to visit his old friends, and that while in this condition, he had fallen sick in some out of the way place, unable to communicate with his friends.

But even this hope died as weeks and months went by, and no word or token came from the lost man. Jessie utterly succumbed to the long strain of suspense and despair. She lay prostrate and speechless, while forgotten days and forgotten opportunities of loving-kindness called to her in sad remorseful repenting. Oh, if just once more, she could hear Steve's strong, rapid step coming towards her! If just once more, she could see him open the door, and look at her with his smile so full of love and truth! Only once! Only once, that she might tell him how dearly she loved, how sorry she was that she had ever grieved, or under-valued him! For now bygone hours tortured her. They showed her what they had expected from her, and what they would have given her. And it was too late! Steve's face, as she had often seen it, with a longing disappointed look, haunted her desolate heart. He would come back no more. She had deceived his hopes so often, and now death, in some form or other, had taken him away forever! She recalled times when she might have made him so happy, and she had doled him out the poorest kind of compensation. She remembered times when she had profited by his generosity, only to protect her own selfishness. He had loved her, and she had wounded him cruelly. Twice she had made him weep. Certain words she had said, certain looks she had given, secret forgotten unkindnesses, all at once became alive, and all said to her "Too late! Too late!" Alas! the irreparable has this magic freshness, and the soul compelled to remember the love it has wasted and wounded, suffers from such refinements of tenderness, real heart-rending. One hour! Jessie prayed for. One hour, of the many hours, in which she had made Steve unhappy. Only one hour, to tell him how sorry she was, to ask his forgiveness, and kiss her pardon from his lips. No! No! Neither to-day, nor tomorrow, nor throughout eternity, would she find one of the many hours she had spent in making miserable the heart that loved her so truly and so unselfishly.

Thus full of wretched remorse and anxiety, the months went by, and it was again spring. Then one day, a dark, rough-looking man entered John's office. He sat down in a chair opposite him, and looking calmly into John's face, said:

"I was with him to the end. I saw everything. I heard the last words he spoke."

"You mean Mr. Lloyd?" asked John, looking at his visitor with sorrowful fear.
